INTRODUCTION.

TO THE READER.

In view of the many difficulties by which the Author has been surrounded, both while collecting the material and preparing his Journal for the press, if he has left sufficient room for criticism, no one will feel surprised. For it has been amid the confusion of the camp, trials of the march, and attentions to the wounded on the field and in the different hospitals, scattered all over Richmond, and at every intervening point from this city to Winchester, Va., that he has succeeded in gathering the items of the History of the Campaign, which are thus published for two purposes: First. To preserve and place in the hand of each soldier a correct account of all his trials; and, secondly. To enable each one to send home to his friends the history of the stirring events of which he has made a part.

When circumstances will permit, he designs publishing a more extended and complete narrative. And, in order to which, he solicits the assistance in the collection of facts, of all who feel an interest in these pages. His thanks are already due to Capt. W. C. Walsh and R. A. Davidge.

T E X A S T O M A R Y L A N D .

The spring of 1861 forms a memorable epoch in the history of America. To those who were living at that day, either active participants in the stirring occurrences of the time, or passive spectators of the drama being enacted before them—the period which ensued from the election of Abraham Lincoln, on the 2d of November, 1860, down to the commencement of open acts of war between the Northern and Southern sections of the people of the United States—will ever be looked upon with a degree of interest fully equal to that which marks any other stage of our Continental career.

True is it, that the time alluded to is not full of startling event or tragic consequence as some that have succeeded—events which have clothed a land, but yesterday, as it were, robed in the bright garments of a bride, in the sable habiliments of mourning, and spread a pall of sorrow and dismal woe from one extremity of the country to the other—but at the same time, the changes taking place, at the time of which we speak, are such as must ever mark it memorable in the history of the American people.

The spectacle of a people, at a time of unexampled prosperity and plenty, blessed with a system of government acknowledged by the world to confer the largest liberality of personal freedom known among organized communities; whose facilities for the attainment of knowledge or wealth were unexampled among nations; where ambition was unrestricted, progress unfettered, religion untrammelled, and liberty of speech, unquestioned and unlimited—whose books and periodicals were, but yesterday, filled with songs of rejoicing and peans of self-gratulation, on account of these manifold blessings—a people, the wonder of the world, and the admiration of mankind, all at once stopped in their onward career. Peace gives way to discord, and chaos takes the place of system. Law and order disappear as if by magic, and anarchy and confusion prevail.

Such were the results of that excited period of time on which we now dwell.

It is not our province to speak of the causes leading to these results. The historian, who shall write of these things, will, doubtless, dive through the dusty and time-worn labyrinth of the past, and uncover hidden causes which had long been at work to bring these evil days upon us; and he will establish, by a system of logical argument, that it was necessary that these things should come to pass, which now “overcome us to our special wonder.”—Our task is less difficult. We only propose taking a glimpse of a band of heroes, who lived in these days, and whose deeds have formed a portion of the history of the times. To trace the career of a body of men who, whatever part they may have taken in bringing on or keeping off the days of peril, have shown themselves able and willing to breast the storm, and to meet the whirlwind in its course.

As early as the month of April, 1861, the State of Texas had undergone this transformation, from a State of peace to a State of armed hostility to the Federal Government. South Carolina and several of the Southern States had seceded, and the Ordinance of Secession had passed in the Convention of Delegates of Texas, on the 2d of March. Argument had been estopped, and the people were preparing for war. Camps of instruction for the training of troops were established at different points in the State—militiamen, armed and unarmed, were marching back and forth through the State—towns and villages, but late so quiet, were filled with country people, who left their farms neglected to come to town to get the news; a crowd could be seen at every post-office, and on every corner—churches at night, instead of sending forth the voice of prayer or song of thanksgiving, were filled with the shouts of excited men, as they were harrangued by some friend to revolution—in a word, on every side could be heard the din of warlike preparation.

Among other camps of instruction, established by order of Gov. Clark, then Governor of Texas, one was established on the San Marcos river, in Hays county, in which were placed some twelve or fifteen companies, who had gone there for the purpose of organization, and when organized, to offer their services to the Government for twelve months. About the time that the organization was to have been perfected by the election of Regimental officers, it was made known officially that no twelve months' men would be received from Texas. This announcement caused considerable disaffection among the men, who had assembled at the camp by virtue of a proclamation from the Governor, more especially, as the announcement was accompanied by the declaration that two regiments for service during the war would be received.

It was given out that Colonel John Marshall, editor of the State Gazette, at Austin, a prominent politician, had just arrived in Texas from Richmond, Virginia, where the newly formed Confederate Government had affixed its Capital, and that through influences brought to bear on the President or Secretary of War, had obtained the privilege that Texas should, as a matter of favor, be allowed a representation in the programme about to be enacted on the soil of Virginia. The companies were to be formed by the enrollment of men, and the election of company officers, and the organization of the regiments to be completed after their arrival in Virginia—the President reserving to himself the authority to appoint regimental officers. This course of arrangement, so different from what the men had expected, disorganized the camp of instruction; but so eager were the men to enter into the service of the country, that four companies for the war were immediately formed upon the ground, and reported themselves to the Governor. The companies formed at that time were the Tom Green Rifles, of Travis county, Capt. B. F. Carter; Guadalupe Rangers, Capt. J. P. Bane, of Guadalupe county; Hardeman Rifles, Capt. J. C. G. Key, of Gonzales county; Mustang Greys, Captain Ed. Cunningham, of Bexar county; and on the 11th day of July, these companies were ordered to break up camps and rendezvous at Harrisburg, near the city of Houston. The companies had a day or two given them in order to make preparations for the journey, and those of them who did not live at too remote a point, visited their homes. The citizens of Texas were full of enthusiasm, and offered every facility in the way of wagons and conveyances, in order to expedite the departure of these first troops to leave the State, and who were going to represent the ancient valor of Texas on a distant theatre. The companies arrived at the place of rendezvous in the latter part of July, and in a few days after the first arrival, twenty companies were in camp.

Brigadier Gen. Earl Van Dorn was at this time in command of the Department of Texas, by authority of the Confederate Government. He had signalized his advent into Texas by the rapid transaction or dispatch of business entrusted to his superintendence, and had impressed all classes most favorably with his character as a man of energy and ability. Gen. Van Dorn had been ordered to despatch these volunteers as speedily as they were raised, to arm and equip them, and to send them to Virginia by the quickest practical route. Gen. Van Dorn however on this occasion, chose to be in no great hurry to send the troops off. Under one pretence or another, the men were kept in the camp, at Buffalo Bayou, for weeks, and until the General could send a messenger to Richmond, remonstrating against the orders which he had received. The messenger at length arrived with a verbal dispatch, (as was understood at the time,) for "General Van Dorn to obey his orders."

It was midsummer when the troops were taken to the camp, on Buffalo Bayou. The camp was in a low miasmatic, unhealthy region, and many of the men here contracted disease, from which they never recovered.

So exhaustive was the climate and the place on the constitution of the men, that very little was done towards drilling them, and at the expiration of the time spent at that place, little or no improvement was discernible. The time spent there was spent most disagreeably, and many were the anathemas indulged in by the men at the cause of delay. While in this camp much kindness was shown the troops by the citizens of the neighborhood, and by those in the city of Houston. One instance is deserving of mention here. Dr. — Bryan, of Houston, had a commodious house fitted up as a hospital, which was filled to the utmost capacity with our sick. He gave his medical attention to all that were sent, and on our departure would receive no compensation whatever for his services, or reimbursement for his expenses. Such patriotism is in marked contrast with the course of many who, during the war, have been able to do something for the soldier, but who have failed, through their sordidness of soul, to do so, and it is proper that we should here notice this friend to the soldier.

DEPARTURE FROM TEXAS.

On the 16th day of August, 1861, orders having been issued by General Van Dorn, the first detachment of troops broke up their camp at Harrisburg, and came into Houston on the cars. The troops were despatched in divisions of five companies each, in order to meet the exigencies of transportation—the companies comprising the first division being A, B, C, D and E, all under the command of Captain J. C. G. Key, of Company A. On that night the companies were quartered in a large ware-house in the suburbs of the city, and the next morning, at an early hour, started for Beaumont, on the Neches, where they embarked per steamer Florilda for Niblets Bluff, on the Sabine.

The hour of departure was hailed with rejoicings by the men, and all countenances were beaming with animation; all hearts were high with hope and confidence, and every bosom seemed warmed by enthusiasm;—the last greetings among friends were interchanged, the last good-byes were said, and away we speed over the flowery prairies, with colors fluttering in the breeze, each hoarse whistle of the locomotive placing distance between us and our loves at home.

At this, the beginning of our travels, which ere we are done with them, will be found to possess more of interest than the gay and lightsome spirit here portrayed would seem to foreshadow, it may not be amiss to take a glance at the personelle of our friends, with whom for a time we are to be so intimately connected, as to be their biographers.

The men of whom we are now writing had come together from the hills and valleys of Texas, at the first sound of the tocsin of war. The first harsh blast of the bugle found them at their homes, in the quiet employment of the arts and avocations of peace. It is a singular fact, but no less singular than true, that those men who, at home, were distinguished among their fellows as peculiarly endowed to adorn and enrich society by their lives and conversation, who were first in the paths of social communion, whose places when they left were unfilled, and until they return again must be as deserted shrines, should be the first to leap from their sequestered seats, the first to flash the rusty steel from its scabbard, and to flash it in the first shock of battle. But so it is, and we venture to assert, that of all those whom this war has drawn to the field, and torn away from the domestic fireside, there will be none so much missed at home as those who left with the first troops for Virginia. They were representative men from all portions of the State—young, impetuous and fresh, full of energy, enterprise, and fire—men of action—men who, when they first heard the shrill shriek of battle, as it came from the far-off coast of South Carolina, at once ceased to argue with themselves, or with their neighbors, as to the why-fores or the where-fores—it was enough to know the struggle had commenced, and that they were Southrons.

Where companies had not been formed in their own counties, they hastened to adjoining counties, and there joined in with strangers. Some came in from the far-off frontier. Some came down from the hills of the North, and some came up from the savannas of the South—all imbued with one self-same purpose, to fight for "Dixie."

Among them could be found men of all trades and professions—attorneys, doctors, merchants, farmers, mechanics, editors, scholastics, &c., &c.—all animated and actuated by the self-same spirit of patriotism, and all for the time being willing to lay aside their plans of personal ambition, and to place themselves on the altar of their country, and to put themselves under the leveling discipline of the army.

On the evening of the 17th, we were embarked at Beaumont on the steamer Florilda, a large and comfortable steamer, upon which we glided off from the landing, and set sail for the Bluff, the terminus of navigation, and from whence our journey had to be made by land. The trip was unattended by any feature of particular interest, and all arrived at Niblets Bluff, on the morning of the 18th, at an early hour, and after debarking and getting all the baggage ashore, the men went into camp in the edge of the town.

BAD TREATMENT.

Here we had the first realization of the fact, that we were actual soldiers, and had the first lesson illustrated to us, that a soldier must be patient under wrong, and that he is remediless under injustice—that he, although the self constituted and acknowledged champion of liberty, has, nevertheless, for the time being, parted with that boon, and, that he is but the victim of all official miscreants who choose to subject him to imposition.

The poor soldier receives many such lessons, and his fortitude and patriotism is often taxed to bear them without open rebellion, but as this was the first instance in which we had an opportunity of seeing and feeling such lessons experimentally, we here chronicle the circumstance for the benefit of all concerned. Gen. Van Dorn had entered into a contract with one J. T. Ward to transport these troops from Texas across to Louisiana, and Ward had undertaken as per agreement to furnish transportation in wagons across the country. He had been going back and forth for weeks, looking at the different roads, preparing the means of transportation; had delayed us in getting off from Texas until all his vast arrangements were systematized, and until all his immense resources could be deployed into proper order, and concentrated at Niblett's Bluff for this grand exodus of two thousand soldiers, who were but awaiting his movements to begin their onward pilgrimage to the great Mecca of their hopes, the "Old Dominion." To hear this man, Ward, spout and splutter among the streets of Houston about his teams and his teamsters, his wagons and his mules, one would have thought that the weight of the whole Quartermaster's Department of the Confederate Army rested upon his shoulders, and that his overburdened head was taxed with the superintendence of trains from California to the Potomac. Be this as it may, on arriving at the Bluff, whatever may have been the resources of our quartermaster, Ward, on this especial occasion he fell short of an approximation to our necessities. We had started on the trip with clothing, camp-equipage, medical stores, and commissary supplies, all complete. The citizens of Texas had left nothing undone on their part to send their sons into the field well supplied with everything essential for their comfort, and, in addition, many things had just been drawn from the agent of the Government, at Houston, which it was important should be carried with us. The troops were new to service, and unaccustomed to marching. It could not be expected that they could make the tedious trip through the swamps of Louisiana, unaided by liberal transportation. Van Dorn had unwisely and unjustly kept them in the sickly miasma of Buffalo Bayou until disease had already fallen in the veins of many, and all of them were suffering more or less from the enervating effects of that confinement. Such was the condition of the men now thrown into a thin and sparsely settled region of Louisiana, dependent alone upon others for every necessity to their new condition.

Under this state of affairs we found seven wagons, with indifferent teams, which Ward had procured for the purpose of transporting five hundred men, with the equipments and outfit mentioned. Ward had come to the Bluff with us on the steamer, but had gone immediately back, after leaving assurances that his preparations for our conveyance were ample. It is said that the wagons that he did furnish, were gathered up in that immediate vicinity, and that he engaged some of them even at so late an hour as our arrival at the Bluff.

The consequences were; that the officers in command had to rely upon themselves for the means of prosecuting the march. Tents, cooking utensils, clothing, medical stores, &c., to a large amount, were stowed away with whosoever would promise to take care of them for us until they could be sent on. Our sick men were left behind, and our journey commenced with what few things could be carried in these wagons.

Such an inauspicious introduction to the service, was far from being encouraging to patriotic ardor, and many vented their curses against Ward, Van Dorn, and all concerned; but so earnest were the men in their devotion to the cause in which they had engaged, and so deep their confidence that all things would work right when we once got fairly under the protecting ægis of our new Government; that soon all mutinous mutterings or complainings were suppressed, and the men set about relieving themselves of their difficulties as soon as possible.

On Sunday, the 19th of August, the line of march was taken up. The morning was wet and rainy, and the roads soft. The column halted in the evening at Cole's Station, about six miles distant, and bivouacked for the night. Wagons were sent back to bring up our sick, and details were made to go out into the neighboring country, and to try and secure additional transportation.

On Monday, the 20th, the troops remained in camp at Cole's Station. It was a bright sunshiny day, the only one of the kind which was experienced on the entire trip. Men from each of the companies were out hunting up wagons, and every hour or two during the day, the agreeable fact was made known by a cheer from the boys that an ambulance had been captured. Some eight or ten were procured during the day, and our means of locomotion considerably increased thereby. Some of the "ambulances" thus impressed into the service were of a most interesting and unique fashion. Some were drawn by oxen, some by horses, and some by mules. Some rejoiced in four wheels, and some in two—some had wagon-beds, and some had none—some showed the handicraft of modern mechanism; while here and there a creaking set of trucks would lead us back to antideluvian times, before men had discovered the uses of iron, or learned the arts of the blacksmith. This mode of improvement was a harsh method of introducing ourselves to the inhabitants of the Calcasieu, and fell upon many of them with inconvenience, but it was our only recourse, and most all of the victims resigned themselves to the tyranny with patriotic composure; but from the vain attempts made in some cases to conceal their stock from our inquisitive detectives, it was evident that their virtue was the resort of necessity.

The next day the journey was resumed over a flat and piny region, and about sundown we arrived at Escobar's store, on the Calcasieu river. Here we had an illustration of Calcasieu as it is—Calcasieu as it was—and Calcasieu as it must ever be in our recollections in future days. The march had been arduous and fatiguing, and scarcely had the train halted, and while the men were engaged in pitching a few tents for the accommodation of the sick, when the windows of Heaven were opened, and the floods descended. The sky had given no premonitory warnings of a storm—it had been drizzling rain during the day, and the boys were all dripping when they arrived at camp; but no hoarse mutterings of far-off thunder, no fitful gleamings of lightning had prepared us for this copious visitation of Heaven's bounteous showers.

It seemed now as if all the arteries and springs which feed the rivers of Heaven were swollen to high water-mark, and that the rivers had burst their channels in aerial space, and bounding over the limitless expanse, were pouring themselves on that devoted spot of Confederate domain, known as Calcasieu. The rain continued all the night through, and we had no respite from its peltings until sunrise the next morning.

The morning came and brought rest from the merciless peltings of the rain. The bright god of day again showed his face, and again we were travellers.

A day's journey of 12 or 15 miles brought us to Clendening's Ferry, on the Calcasieu. This stream is wide and deep at this point, and navigable for vessels of respectable tonnage. The troops were crossed over without difficulty in a schooner, owned by Captain Goos, a resident of the place, who not only in this, but in all other transactions with the soldiers, acquitted himself as a clever man and a true patriot. His house was thrown open to the reception of as many as could be entertained, and his open-hearted and hospitable lady set to work with her whole retinue of servants, preparing food for the weary and hungry soldiers. They set no price upon their labors, and would receive no compensation for their bounteous outlay of provisions, and seemed to be only desirous of learning our necessities in order to minister to them. The troops having crossed over, the wagons were next in order, and here came the tug of war. The banks on the east side of the stream were very steep, and the continued rains had made them so slippery that our animals could not hold their footing, and the men had to perform the labor of getting them up the bank themselves. A rope was attached to the tongue of a wagon, and the boys having formed a line on top of the hill, thus drew them up. The labor was severe; a continuous rain falling all the time, added to the discomfort. All the night long was thus spent, and daylight found them still at the work—but at last it was accomplished, and once more we are ready to proceed.

Leaving the Calcasieu, our march was continued through a constant rain, through swamps and marshes, lagoons, wrecks, and every imaginable species of watery element, many of them over waist-deep, until we at length came to a halt, after a day's journey of 10 or 12 miles. We were halted in a prairie, immediately on a stream, whose waters were running out of its banks, and still rising. The wagons could not be crossed, and we went into camp to await the developments of the night. The next morning a rude bridge was constructed, over which the wagons were hauled by hand, while the animals swam across. The teams were then hitched up, and we proceeded eight miles to a stage stand, at a point called Pine Island, when we encamped late in the evening, the weather still continuing rainy.

On the 25th we had the same sort of road, and similar weather for about 12 miles, to Welsh's Station. Here we crossed the stream on trees which we felled across it, and with some difficulty got our wagons over.

26th. Came to the Mermentau river. This day's march was, perhaps, the most severe on the trip. The distance traveled was not so great as on some other days, but at every step the toiling and wearied pedestrian encountered what appeared to be a little deeper and a little softer spot. It was on this day that we made the crossing of the "Grand Marias," or more aptly termed by the boys the "Grand Miry." In many places the men waded up to the neck through the swamps, where the alligators lay basking in the tall grass, as if disputing the passage, and seemed reluctant to give way without a stern admonition in the way of a bayonet thrust, to impress them with a proper respect for the characters of the newcomers. Many were bayoneted by the soldiers, and held up in triumph as they went on plunging through the dangerous waters.

Leaving this stream on the 27th, a long march of 26 miles was made, diversified by the same series of watery trials, and on the next day, the 28th, we arrived at Lafayette, a nice little town in Lafayette Parish, Louisiana. The troops bivouacked that night about two miles distant from the town, on Vermillion Bayou, in grounds owned by ex-Governor Mouton.

The Governor not only offered his grounds and timbers adjacent for our use, but called in his neighbors and gathered together all the vehicles that were serviceable in the community to forward us on to New Iberia, distant twenty-five miles.

Hitherto our journey had been made through a country almost destitute of civilization. No smiling towns or villages had dotted the watery waste—no sight of groaning barns, or fields of waving grain had delighted our visions, as tramp, tramp, splash, splash, we threaded the uncertain depths of swamp and morass. What few settlers we had passed were a poor class of citizens, chiefly engaged in the business of shipping lumber out of the numerous lakes and bayous, or now and then a herdsman with a band of cattle or sheep in charge. Now we had again arrived in the white settlement, and were once more among a generous and hospitable people. The next day we made an early start, our largely increased transportation enabling by far the greater number of the men to ride; and as we continued our day's journey, other wagons, carriages, and horses were kindly placed at our disposal, until by the time we reached New Iberia, almost every one had some sort of conveyance to ride upon. The advance part of our train arrived at Iberia about 12 o'clock, M., and by 4 or 5 P. M., the whole party were up and ready for embarkation on the steamer.

Col. Wm. H. Stewart, of Gonzales, had preceded us in order to engage a steamer to convey us to Brashear city, and on our arrival we found the steamer at the wharf, ready to bear us on our journey.

As a matter of course, great joy was manifested on our arrival at the terminus of our long pilgrimage. We had now travelled a distance of one hundred and fifty-five miles in a period of about twelve days. During this entire period we had seen but one dry day, and the men had not known what it was to have dry clothing or dry blankets. On the march, during the day, they were wholly unprotected from the peltings of the elements, and at night threw themselves on the wet ground, very frequently without fires, where they shivered the night through. In order to travel better, the men divested themselves of all heavy articles of apparel, even to their coats, pants and shoes; and it was a common spectacle on the road to see a manly specimen of human nature trudging along, singing Dixie as he went, minus everything in the shape of clothes except a shirt. Such was the appearance of our men when they entered the lively little town of New Iberia. But the generous and whole-souled denizens of the town soon gave us assurances that we were among friends, and that they appreciated the patriotism and devotion that had thrown us in this plight among them.—Provisions, eatables, drinkables, &c., were furnished us in abundance, the beautiful ladies greeted us with the witchery of their smiles, and fathers and mothers cheered us with approval as we came, and sent us away with their best wishes and prayers. Evening found us gliding down the waters of the last Louisiana Bayou which we were for a time to know, and in the morning without accident we lay at the wharf at Brashear city. From hence we took the cars for the Crescent city, where we arrived at night, crossed the river and were quartered in an old cotton ware-house for the night.

We tarried in New Orleans but one day, and left on the evening of Sept. 1st, on the cars for Richmond. While the trip possessed an interest as showing the mighty revolution going on in the country, it was unattended by any feature of particular adventurage.

The journey was slow and tedious. The roads were thronged with soldiers from New Orleans to Richmond, and the whole country presented the appearance of a vast camp. We were the first Texans that had passed in a large body, and on this account were more or less the objects of attention. We were delayed at several points, and laid over at Knoxville, Tenn., four days, awaiting transportation.

We arrived at Richmond on the 12th day of September, and were placed in camp at Rocketts. In a few days the remaining companies arrived, and the whole body of Texans were removed out of the city about three miles, to await our organization into regiments.

CAMP TEXAS ORGANIZATION.

Our new camp was situated in convenient proximity to the city, in a healthy locality, and was styled "Camp Texas," in honor of our Lone Star State. Here the drill was again resumed, and our company officers set to work in earnest in preparing the men for the field.

The great topic of conversation, and the all-absorbing question was, "Who will be our Regimental Officers?" "Who will command us?" It has been seen that the two regiments had come on to Virginia without organization—this matter having been deferred to the Confederate authorities in Richmond—and now that the time was approaching, the question became one of interest to all Texans at the Capital, whether belonging to the army or not.

It had been represented in Texas that the President and the War Department had taken this matter of military appointments especially in charge—that their wisdom had grasped the subject, and considered it in all its details, and were resolved no mishap should befall our arms by reason of neglect in this particular matter—the appointment of leaders to show our brave boys the nearest and easiest paths to victory and glory.

It was said that the lives of soldiers were too precious, and the interests of freedom too dear, to permit incompetent men to have places in the army as officers.

It was intimated that at Richmond there would be found sitting in imperial state, an imposing board of military Savans, deeply skilled in all the mysteries of military science, and so deeply imbued with occult lore, that no one but a man of military requirements and personal ability might hope to pass the ordeal of their examination. Under such an apprehension, several gentlemen of ability and experience in the field had abandoned their association with us in Texas, through fear of submitting their humble pretensions to so severe a system of anlyzation, and we had come on in calm trust of these flattering promises of the Government, and were here ready to undergo the transmutation from a state of provincial rusticity and greenness to a state of military system and perfection, by some legerdemain of the West Point tactician. But alas! for the deceitfulness of human hopes, and the mutability of human calculations, it did not appear that we were so likely to get as competent officers over us by the appointment of the authorities as we had left behind us in Texas, or brought with us to Virginia. The first attempt at giving a Colonel to the 4th Regiment, was the appointment of R. T. P. Allen, a citizen of Bartrop, Texas, and the President of the Military Institute at that place. This gentleman, although a man of thorough military education, was not acceptable to either men or officers. He had been in command of the Camp of Instruction, at Camp Clark, Texas, and the men had there with remarkable unanimity, come to the conclusion that he did not suit their views of a commander. A protest against this appointment was made by the officers of the Regiment, and Colonel Allen returned to Texas.

John B. Hood was then appointed Colonel of the 4th, and as his name will appear interwoven through many pages of this narrative, it is not necessary to speak of him here.

John Marshall, of Austin, received the appointment of Lieutenant Colonel, and Bradfute Warrick, of Virginia, that of Major.

These two latter appointments were, at the time, matter of severe animadversion among the men. Neither appointment was acceptable to the command.

Colonel Marshall was esteemed as a brave man, and admired as an eminent civilian—an able editor, and a good Democrat—a friend to Secession, and devoted to the cause of the South. But it was not deemed that he came up to the standard as a military man, and his selection over the heads of others who were qualified, was looked upon as savoring too much of a spirit of political favoritism.—

Major Warrick was altogether unknown, and being a Virginian, in nowise connected or identified with Texas or Texans, his appointment was looked upon as unjust to the men and to the State of Texas. No steps were taken, however, in opposition to the appointments. J. D. Wade, Quartermaster, with the rank of Captain—Lieutenant Burroughs, of Co. K., Commissary, which he resigned in favor of Tom Owens, who assumed the position—R. H. Bassett, of Co. G, was appointed Adjutant, and Tom Cunningham, of Co. F, was appointed Sergeant-Major. Thus was the 4th Texas organized, and with these officers the Regiment entered the field.

The 5th Texas Regiment was being organized at the same time, and a similar policy was pursued in the appointment of officers for it. The first individual who presented himself with his credentials as Colonel, was a representative of the Tribe of Benjamin, whose name is now forgotten. I do not know that I ever heard it, and how he came to be put forward, where he came from or whither he went after his untoward reception, is altogether unknown. He was a veritable Jew, and his career with us was of short duration. He came out to the camp in all the pomp and circumstance befitting his high position, splendidly mounted on a steed as splendidly caparisoned—glittering with the tinsel of gold, and bearing about him all the symbols of his rank, in a manner quite unexceptionable. He rode among and examined his new command, and expressed himself satisfied with the material turned over to his care. In fact, after looking over the tall forms of our boys, their intrepid bearing and speaking force, he thought they would do for him, and had as little doubt that he would do for them. In the exuberance of his satisfaction at the prospect before him, he exclaimed—

“I tinks I can manage te Texas poys,” and I tinks pose togeter we can clean out te — Yankees.

The boys gathered around him and manifested their wonder at the liberality of the appointing power, by divers and sundry remarks, which to be appreciated properly should have been heard.

“What,” says one, “What is it? Is it a man, a fish, or a bird?” Of course it is a man, says another, “Don’t you see his legs.”

“Well,” says another, “that thing may be a man, but we don’t call them men in Texas.”

With such polite remarks were the ears of our Israelitish friend greeted on every side, and while he was at a loss somewhat to comprehend the conduct of te poys in its full significance, he saw enough to give him some uneasiness and misgivings as to the task he had assumed.

The next morning, on ordering his horse to take a ride, our Colonel discovered that instead of the sweeping air of his proud charger as hitherto displayed, that he came out dejected in gait, and with downcast looks. An examination proved that he had been entirely divested of his great ornament. His tail had been cut off during the night.

Without a remark of any kind, without a solitary good-bye, without one last sigh of farewell, Colonel —— left, and was never heard of by the 5th Texas again. The Regiment was then organized by the appointment of J. J. Archer, Colonel; J. B. Robertson, Lieutenant Colonel; and Q. J. Quattlebum, Major—Lient. Col. Robertson the only Texan among them.

The time was improved by a daily system of drilling, the men and officers all entering into the exercises with a spirit and zest worthy of the cause to which they had consecrated themselves.

We were now organized, and new life and vigor diffused itself through every department, and into all our exercises. The question of “Who shall be our officers?” gave place to speculations as to the ability and relative qualifications of those who had been appointed to command. The measles had thinned our ranks, but we still had quite a respectable line, save in one thing. On dress parade there were so many of the convalescents coughing at the same time, that it was difficult sometimes to hear the command of the Colonel. But when the Colonel himself—with whom the men were not sufficiently acquainted to take liberties—was absent, the noise made by one hundred and one men coughing, with the interesting style and unique orders given by the commanding officer afforded opportunity to the boys for the exercise of their risibles, which they improved to great advantage. And many of them were so delighted at the displays as to be heard even until a late hour of the night going through the manuel of arms.

REMOVAL TO THE POTOMAC.

The winter coming on, all felt anxious to know to what part of the field—whether to the Peninsula, Western Virginia, or Potomac—we would be ordered; or if we were to go into winter quarters at this place. Orders were received on the 4th of November, to send away all surplus baggage, and prepare for the march, and not until the 7th did we know where we were going. At last it was announced that we were to become a part of the “ARMY OF THE POTOMAC.” All were satisfied. This was the place to which we wished to be assigned. For it was believed that that would be the scene of active operations, and as the boys were spoiling for a fight, they were delighted with the prospect; and on the 8th we marched in and took the cars for Brooks’ Station, where we arrived in the evening, and pitched our tents for the night. Next morning, while making arrangements to march, we received orders from General Holmes to remain. It was rumored that the enemy were making demonstrations on the Maryland shore, as if they intended crossing. No further evidences were given of such a design up to the 12th instant, when we received a telegram from Gen. Wigfall to move forward on the next morning to Dumfries. In a short time another message by the wires came for us to move up without delay, for the enemy was threatening his position. In a few minutes every tent on the field dropped, the wagons were packed and piled—and now it became apparent that our baggage was much beyond the capacity of transportation, and a large quantity had to be stored and left—and a little before sunset the line was formed and wheeled off for a long, muddy, tiresome tramp. It was an interesting march. We had traversed the swamps of Louisiana when they stood at high water-mark, but we had day light to travel in. Now we had to sight for the course, and guess at the bottom. And, if I were allowed to guess, judging from my own feeling, the "soundings" were not so amusing as when aboard the Florilda, crossing the Bay. We had been in the service just long enough for the company officers to feel considerable pride in keeping their lines well "dressed," and it is unnecessary for me to say that they had a good time of it that night, and especially towards daylight, about half an hour before which we reached the ancient city. We had moved 18 miles during the night, and were present, if not ready, for a fight. But as good luck would have it, the signs for a fight had disappeared, and we were allowed to sleep and rest during the day. Next morning we were ordered to move down and select a camp on the Potomac. But we had not gone far when a courier arriving in post-haste, said "the Yankees are coming." General Wigfall soon rode up and told us we must meet them. The boys said, "that is what we came for," and with a loud cheer moved off—now for a lively time. After a mile through the deep mud, the weight of gun, cartridge-box, big knife, six shooter, and tremendous knapsack, begun to steady the men down to a moderate gait—for they were packed like Mexican mules for market. We were halted, and the surplus was piled, and on the line moved for about three miles. Here we met another courier who informed us that it was a mistake. There were no Yankees on this side the river, and the cannonading which we heard was the batteries firing at some little schooners passing the river. All felt disappointed. But in the absence of a chance to annoy the Yankees, the boys begun on each other, and there were some good jokes and hearty laughs passed along the line. One was accused of turning pale, another with breaking down to get to the rear. Somebody had taken the cholice, and one of the officers had taken the ring off of his finger and given it to his servant saying, "Here, Charley, take this ring, and if I get killed, give it to ——," &c., &c.

We then moved to the river and camped for the night, and it was several days before we went into a permanent camp, on Powell's Run, where we remained during the winter. There was but little of interest in our quarters, except rain, sleet, snow and mud, with which we were blessed in great abundance. How often it rained, and how deep the mud got before spring, it would be needless to tell any one with the expectation that he would believe it, unless he had seen the Calcasieu.

We here met with the 1st Texas Regiment, commanded by Col. McLeod, and the three regiments, 1st, 4th and 5th, were organized into a Brigade, styled the Texas Brigade, under the command of Brigadier General Louis T. Wigfall. The 18th Georgia was afterwards added to the command, and at a later period Hampton's Legion, from South Carolina. The 1st Texas Regiment was composed of companies that had hurried to Virginia on the first breaking out of hostilities; they had come on without any regimental organization, and were at first formed into a Regiment and placed under the command of Col. Wigfall. When the Brigade was formed, Wigfall became Brigade Commander. Col. Wm. H. Stewart, on the organization of the Brigade, received the appointment of Commissary, with the rank of Major, and Moses B. George that of Quartermaster, with the same rank.

As soon as it was understood we were quartered for the winter, the men set about building cabins; and it would puzzle any artist in the world to give the style of architecture in the cantonment, consequently we will not attempt the task. For some of them were on the hill, and some under the hill; some were on top of the ground and others were under the ground. Some were large, while others were small. One was in this shape, and another in that shape. Mess No. 2 had a high house, while No. 5 had a short house. No. 3 had his chimney inside, and No. 7 had his on the outside. And the doors—where do you suppose they were? But I must here call to mind the important night alarm we had about the time these skillful builders were laying out their plans and laying off their buildings. For it was in the midst of their consultations as to whether they would have the door by the jam, or in the gable-end; the window under the bed, or in the chimney; the shelf on the floor, or out of doors; whether all should sleep in one bed, or each by himself—when at midnight, in the midst of a drenching rain, a picket came dashing in and reported the enemy crossing the river and marching upon us. All hands were called up, and the preliminaries for a night attack were hastily disposed of, and all were in readiness for a fight or a foot-race, as future developments should indicate would be for the best. Over on the other side of the run Col. Wofford had his men in line of battle, awaiting the onset. And we heard Col. Hood tell General Wigfall that Colonel W., he thought, had taken his position down on the hill-side, in front of his Regiment, and was ready with his pistol cocked, to blow them up if they came. To the right we could hear that "same old drum" calling up the braves of the 5th to go after the disturbers of our dreams. And the ardor of Colonel Archer being greater than that of the other commanders, he marched his men out to meet them—half way—two miles from his camp. But as the rain continued to fall during their reconnoissance, we are of opinion—although we never heard from him on the subject—that he returned to camp considerably cooled down. When morning came, it developed the fact that no troops had crossed, except about a dozen, whose object, from the tracts left on the beach, was to catch our pickets and introduce them to General Sickles, on the Maryland shore, but had failed.

During the greater portion of the winter there was a detail of about twenty men from each of the Texas Regiments, kept on the Occoquan, to watch the enemy's movements, and annoy them in their advances. They soon became a terror to scouts and pickets from the other side, and chances for a shot grew more unfrequent as the enemy became better acquainted with their style of manners. In the latter part of January, nine of these scouts, principally of the 1st, put up at a house near the Accotink Mills, on the other side of the river, to spend the night. At a late hour, being led by a citizen, Lieut. Col. Burk, 37th N. Y., with 90 men and a detachment of cavalry, surrounded the house and demanded a surrender. The boys were aroused from sleep, and gathering their guns, immediately opened fire, which was briskly returned. After three rounds one of the men shouted, "Hurra, boys, Hampton's coming, I hear him on the bridge;" at which they took fright and le't.—Next morning revealed the fact that they had killed as many as there were men of their own party, and through prisoners learned they had wounded as many more.

About the 1st of March, 21 of the 18th Georgia were ordered to this party, who passed up to the Pohick church for the purpose of ambushing the enemy's scouts, but the enemy ambushed them; yet they did not fire on them, fearing they might be their own men.

After going half a mile, they concealed themselves to await the coming of the enemy, but to their surprise they came in a different direction to the one anticipated. But when in proper distance, our men fired and brought down a Colonel, a Quartermaster, a Captain, and eleven privates, and then made their way back across to our side unhurt. After our men passed them, they sent off for four companies to surround them, but they were too late, but were in good time to bury those who had sent for them.

Early in February, a detail from each company of the different Regiments, of a commissioned and non-commissioned officer was made and sent to Texas for recruits, who left about the 10th inst.

While at Richmond we had Divine Services regularly on Sabbath, and each night when circumstances would permit. But after removing to the Potomac, for the want of a comfortable place for meeting, our opportunities were lessened. For while the weather was so unpleasant, we had the privilege of preaching only when the Sabbath was suitable for out-door services.

EVACUATION OF THE POTOMAC.

Previous to 5th March, nothing of stirring interest occurred.—The same unvarying round of camp duties was performed; but little interest was felt either by officers or men. The weather was so disagreeable and the roads so muddy, that drills and even dress parades had to be dispensed with, and cooking, eating and sleeping constituted our chief employments.

On the date above mentioned, a detail of 20 men was made from each of the three Texas Regiments, with orders to report to Col. Wade Hampton, then on the Occoquan. They did so, and formed a rear guard to his command, as it moved back via Manassas to Fredericksburg, where they arrived March 11, and were highly complimented by that excellent officer, in a written order, not only for the manner in which this duty had been performed, but for their services on former occasions.

Orders having previously been issued, the Brigade decamped on the afternoon of March 8th. After forming for the march, Colonel Hood addressed the 4th Texas as follows:

“Soldiers—I had hoped that when we left our winter-quarters, it would be to move forward; but those who have better opportunities of judging than we have, order otherwise. You must not regard it as a disgrace—it is never a disgrace to retreat when the welfare of your country requires such a movement. Ours is the last Brigade to leave the lines of the Potomac. Upon us devolves the duties of a rear guard, and in order to discharge them faithfully, every man must be in his place, at all times. You are now leaving your comfortable winter-quarters to enter upon a stirring campaign—a campaign which will be filled with blood, and fraught with the destinies of our young Confederacy. Its success or failure rests upon the soldiers of the South. They are equal to the emergency. I feel no hesitation in predicting that you, at least, will discharge your duties, and when the struggle does come, that proud banner you bear, placed by the hand of beauty in the keeping of the brave, will ever be found in the thickest of the fray.—Fellow-soldiers—Texans—let us stand or fall together. I have done.”

With three cheers for Colonel Hood, and a lingering look at the old camp—the scene of many a merry and idle hour—we took up the line of march, and camped that night on the south side of the Chapewamsic.

To prevent our movements being known to the enemy, whose camps could be seen on the Maryland shore, we left our tents and cabins standing, and, for want of transportation, were forced to abandon a portion of our personal baggage. Of the small amount with which we started, the quartermaster threw away a great part, owing to the wretched condition of the roads, and by so doing bitterly disappointed many, both officers and men.

Moving next morning at daylight, we reached Austin's Run just before dark. This camp will long be remembered by every lover of the wild and beautiful who was there. Two hill-sides, facing each other, were occupied each by two regiments. The night was dark and cold, and fuel plenty. The countless fires, sparkling and crackling the dense shadow of the heavy forest, and the dusky forms of the soldiers moving to and fro, combined with the impenetrable darkness of the back-ground, lent a wild grandeur to the scene, which fully explained the charms of a gipsy life. Started early next morning, and marching all day through the rain, camped about four P. M. on Potomac Run. On the 11th, Colonel Hood received notice of his appointment as Brigadier General. This made Lieut. Col. Marshall our Colonel, and the other officers took rank accordingly. March 12. Left our camp on Potomac Run, and crossing the Rappahannock at Falmouth, took a position about two miles west of Fredericksburg.

March 13.—A detail was made from each Texas Regiment of one Lieutenant and fifteen men, who were ordered to return to the vicinity of Dumfries, to watch the movements of the enemy. They captured prisoners daily, and on the 18th, at Glasscock's Hill, they saw a brigade cross the Potomac, pass up to Dumfries, back to Evansport, and recross the river. On the next day they captured a Yankee Chinaman, who being committed to the care of Barker, (of Co. G, 4th Texas,) and proving a little stubborn, that practical frontiersman quietly placed the Celestial across his lap, and with his leathern belt administered such a chastisement as that "ruthless invader" had probably not received since childhood. March 20.—McAnelly, Norris, Gee and Barker visited our old camp and brought away a considerable quantity of baggage, and destroyed most of the tents. On the 27th, McAnelly and Barker discovered a boat, with what they thought but three men, land at Glasscock's Hill. Slipping up, under cover of a fish-house to within thirty steps of the river, they demanded a surrender. Judge of their surprise, when instead of three, fifteen men made their appearance, and showed a disposition to fight. This was what "Old Abe" would call a "big job," and so thought the scouts; but it was too late "to rue," and they immediately opened the fight by shooting down the two nearest, and hastily repeating the fire, the Yankees "took water" and pushed out from shore. Before getting beyond range, however, six more had rolled from their seats, wounded if not killed. The crew briskly returned the fire, but the scouts with commendable prudence, kept the house before them, and the minnies whistled harmlessly. On the 2d April, Barker, Horn and Dickey, having discovered a regiment encamped near Evansport, attempted to cut off and capture four of their guard. But their motions were discovered and the squad broke for camps, yelling "Rebels" at every jump. Two of the scouts fired, wounding one Yankee, and Barker succeeded in capturing the Sergeant in charge, but that official showing a disposition to be troublesome, Barker shot him down and did what he could for "number one." On the 3d, Sickles' Brigade landed at Glasscock's Hill and Evansport, and moving in two columns, met at Acquia church, the head-quarters of the Texans.—The avowed object of this foray was the capture of these same scouts; but old rangers were not to be caught so easily. Dispatching a courier to Gen'l Whiting, they quietly retreated before the baffled enemy, and taking advantage of every hill to pick off a straggler, they succeeded, according to Gen'l Sickles' own assertion, in killing and wounding eight of his men. Through some mishap, the courier did not reach head-quarters until after dark. The Texas Brigade was immediately ordered to meet the Yankees, and moved at 10 P. M. in the following order. 5th, 4th and 1st Texas, and 18th Georgia. When within about three miles of Stafford C. H., Col. Marshall having fallen asleep on his horse while the men were resting a few minutes, the 5th Reg't moved off unawares, and when the Colonel was roused up, was out of sight. In a short distance the road forked and we took the wrong direction, and did not regain the right road until daylight, when we found the 5th Texas waiting for us. Here we learned that Gen'l Sickles, after pillaging most of the houses at Stafford, had taken the alarm and left the Court-House in retreat, just one hour before we left Fredericksburg in pursuit. As overtaking them was impossible, we remained in bivouac until the following morning, when we returned to camp. On the 6th, orders were issued to be ready to move in an hour, and severe punishment threatened all "stragglers" and "foragers" while on the march. On the following day, at noon, we started, the weather alternating with snow, sleet and rain, until we reached Milford's Station. General Hood pronounced this the severest weather he had ever experienced on a march. Here we were placed upon the cars, and arrived at Ashland about noon, where we remained for two or three days. Leaving here we took the road to Yorktown, where we arrived in tolerable condition, considering the rain and mud we had encountered. Here we were assigned the position of "1st Brigade of the 1st Division, Reserve Corps of the Army of the Potomac," and bivouacked about one mile in rear of the line of defences, on the ground occupied by the Rebel Army of the first revolution, just previous to the memorable battle of Yorktown. How many pleasing recollections crowd upon the mind of each soldier as he walks over these grounds, or sitting thoughtfully by his faggots, recalls the history of the past, and compares it with the scenes of the present. The patriots of the Revolution were struggling for liberty, and so are we. They had been oppressed with burdensome taxation—so were we. They remonstrated—so did we. They submitted until submission ceased to be a virtue—and so have we. They appealed to Parliament, but were unheard. Our Representatives in Congress pointed to the Maëlstrom to which they were driving the ship, but they refused to see it. Our fathers asked for equality of rights and privileges, but it was refused. The South asked that their claim to territory, won by the common blood and treasure of the country be recognized, and that our domestic institutions, as guaranteed by the Constitution, be respected. These petitions were answered by professed ministers (?) of the Church of Jesus Christ, in raising contributions from the sacred pulpit, on the holy Sabbath, of Sharpe's Rifles, to shed Southern blood on common territory. Their Representatives declared upon the floors of Congress that they were "in favor of an anti-slavery Constitution, an anti-slavery Bible, and an anti slavery God!!" What was now left us? Naught but the refuge our fathers ha'—the God of Justice, and the God of Battles. To Him have we appealed, and by his aid and our good right arms, we will pass through the ordeal of blood, and come out conquerors in the end. But to return. The spring here referred to is about two miles above the old city, and the battle-ground about the same distance below. There are yet histories of that battle to be found in the houses, which were not written by the pen of the scribe, but with iron shot from British cannon. Who would then have believed that the Stars and Stripes, the emblem of liberty, would so soon become the ensign of oppression.

During our stay at Yorktown, details were made daily from the Texas Regiments to act as sharp-shooters in the trenches. Some of their skirmishes were brisk and interesting. Previous to our arrival, the sharp-shooters of the enemy had approached to within two hundred yards of our fortifications, and from tree tops and rifle pits easily picked off every man who thoughtlessly exposed his head. This they could do in comparative safety, as the troops in the trenches were armed with smooth-bored muskets. The Texans, however, were supplied with Minnie and Enfield rifles, and what was still more to the purpose, knew how to use them. During the first day's shooting, several Yankees were picked out of trees and holes, evidently very much to their surprise, and after that confined themselves chiefly to their fortifications. The sport then consisted principally in watching for each others heads above the breast-works, and woe to the man who exposed himself for more than a few seconds. On one occasion a Mexican, becoming interested in some object outside the works, incautiously raised his head above the trenches, when crack went a rifle, and a minnie ball ploughed through his cheek. Exasperated by so severe a reminder of his duty, he sprang over the defences and in full view approached within a hundred yards of the enemy's lines, and dared any and all to come out like men and fight him. This they declined to do and commenced firing; but either he bore a charmed life or their nerves were unstrung, for not a ball touched him, although he walked back very deliberately and climbed inside our works. In these little affairs two Texans were killed and several wounded, all owing to some carelessness or bravado of their own.

While here the horse arrived which had been purchased by the privates of the 4th Texas as a present to General Hood. At dress parade on the 26th of April, 1st Sergeant J. M. Bookman, of Co. G, presented him in the following words:

"SIR: In behalf of the non-commissioned officers and privates of the 4th Texas Regiment, I present you this war-horse. He was selected and purchased by us for this purpose, not that we hoped by so doing to court your favor, but simply because we, as freemen and Texans, claim the ability to discern, and the right to reward, merit wherever it may be found. In you, sir, we recognize the soldier and the gentleman. In you we have found a leader whom we are proud to follow—a commander whom it is a pleasure to obey; and this horse we tender as a slight testimonial of our admiration. Take him, and when the hour of battle comes, when mighty hosts meet in the struggle of death, we will, as did the troops of old, who rallied around the white plume of Henry, look for your commanding form and this proud steed as our guide, and gathering there we will conquer or die. In a word, General, 'you stand by us and we will stand by you.'"

General Hood here advanced, and springing into the saddle, addressed the Regiment in a few feeling and eloquent words, expressing his gratitude at this mark of confidence, and promising we should not look in vain for a rallying point when the struggle came. Nothing further of interest occurred until the

EVACUATION OF THE PENINSULA.

This important movement, rendered necessary by the fact that we were confronted by a superior force, and flanked both right and left by navigable streams, occupied solely by the enemy's fleet, was fixed for the 3d of May, but owing to the mismanagement of some commander along the lines, was delayed until the following morning. It might then have been accomplished in secrecy, had not the whiskey-drinking propensities of some of our cavalry led them into a trap which had been arranged for the reception of the Yankees. Secret mines had been placed in several houses, to explode on entrance. Ignorant of this fact, our enterprising troopers burst open a door, and though unsuccessful in their search for liquor, came out of the house considerably "elevated," though without any serious results to themselves. The explosion which followed started other matches, and soon it seemed as though a fierce battle was raging in the ancient little city. Many of the buildings caught fire, and just as the grey of morning began to tinge the eastern sky, a lurid glare was thrown upon the surrounding country, which gave a wild and exaggerated aspect to every object in sight. It was a grand scene. Our army had already passed up the road towards Williamsburg, leaving Whiting's Division, of which we were a part, as the rear guard. We remained here in line of battle until sunrise, when we took up the line of march, the Texas Brigade in the rear and the 4th Texas in rear of that. Why our men were so often used as the rear guard, not only to the army corps, to which they belong, but detailed for other portions, as in the case of Hampton's Legion in evacuating the Potomac, I never could imagine, unless it was for their superiority in woodcraft and skirmishing. After a tiresome day's march, during which we were several times thrown into line of battle, we reached Williamsburg, where the army had halted at about 5 P. M.; and passing through, bivouacked about two miles above town. About an hour after we had passed through, the advance guard of the enemy appeared, and after exchanging a few artillery compliments, retired. On the following morning a field onset was made and continued until evening. In this battle the Federals were repulsed with a heavy loss, amounting in killed, wounded and prisoners to about 5,000. Our loss was also severe, and amounte! to about 2,500. The courage and endurance of our troops were fearfully tried in this engagement, but they stood the test like true Soutarons and patriots, battling for freedom. On the night previous to this battle, news reached our Generals that the enemy with gun-boats and transports was pushing up York river. It was now evident that by a rapid movement on our rear, they expected to retard our progress until they could debark troops at Eltham's Landing, opposite West Point, and by cutting our army in two, at least capture our artillery and wagon train.—Great energy and courage were now required to save the retreating army. If they were allowed time to select and occupy their positions, serious disaster must be the result. This enterprise was committed to proper hands. At 11 o'clock that night, General Whiting's Division, notwithstanding their hard day's march, were called up and put in motion. Through the rain and mud they marched until day, and on until night again, when a halt was ordered, and tired, hungry and wet, the men dropped where they stood and slept in spite of the storm. The next morning scouts were thrown out to feel for the position of the enemy, and the command was allowed a few hours rest. This being "ration day," and the commissary "missing," the men were informed that they could go across the road to a corn-crib and help themselves to some corn on the cob, to be eaten raw, or roasted in the ashes as their different tastes might prompt. All were hungry enough to appreciate this liberality, and such corn-cracking as followed has seldom been heard outside a hog-pen, and a hearty laugh went round, when some wag, seated on a log, called imperiously for "a bundle of fodder and bucket of salt and water." After night, two men of the 5th Texas got separated from their company, which was out on picket duty, and while searching for it came upon a squad of men in the woods, just as the order "Fall in—company" was delivered. Not being ceremonious they obeyed promptly and marched off. Judge of their surprise and chagrin when they, too late, discovered that they had joined a Yankee company, and being unable to "surround it" as the Irishman did the Hessians, they quietly surrendered their arms, and acknowledged themselves "taken in."

BATTLE OF ELTHAM'S LANDING.

The command was put in motion at daylight of May 7th, and about 7 o'clock A. M., came upon a picket of the enemy, who fired two shots at Gen. Hood, who was riding at the head of the 4th Texas, now in front. One shot struck Corporal Sapp, of Co. H, in the head, inflicting a severe but not dangerous wound. Private John Deal, of Co. A, whose gun was loaded, immediately fired upon the pickets as they ran, and struck the only one in sight, killing him instantly. Some confusion was observed at first in consequence of empty guns, and Col. Marshall's order to "Fall back into the woods and load;" but Gen. Hood immediately called out to the men to "move up," which they did at double quick, and line of battle was immediately formed on the brow of a hill. Beyond this hill, which had a precipitous descent, was an open field of six or eight hundred yards width. On the opposite side were some four or five companies of the enemy, who immediately began falling back into the timber, but not until several random shots had been fired by our men, which we afterwards discovered had killed five and wounded as many more. Company B (Capt. Carter) was then ordered by Gen. Hood to deploy as skirmishers and "feel the enemy." They advanced across the open field, and entering the timber, began a "running fight." Co. G (Captain Hutcheson) was then ordered forward to support Co. B, if necessary; if not, to deploy on its right—the latter course was adopted. Co. K (Capt. Martin) was next sent to support Co. B, and Co. E (Captain Ryon) to the support of Co. G. After retreating about half a mile, the Yankees made a stand behind an old mill-dam, and a spirited engagement ensued between them and the right platoon of Co. B, under Captain Carter, and Co. G., Capt. Hutcheson.—Co. H (Capt. Porter) now arrived upon the ground, with orders to support the left platoon of Co. B, under Lieut. Walsh. The firing now became general, and the enemy, many of their guns missing fire, threw them down and fled. While pursuing them, the second platoon of Co. B came upon a large force. (some two hundred,) protected by a heavy palisade. This was more than was bargained for, and the boys, some twenty-five in number, immediately "treed," and answered their volleys, by picking off every one who showed his head. At this juncture Gen. Hood appeared, and ordered the Lieutenant in command to charge the works, and he would send support. Just as the command "charge" was given, and the boys with a yell, had started for the works, the first platoon of Co. B appeared upon the left flank of the palisade, and the Yankees fled in confusion, leaving seventeen killed and several wounded in the track of their flight. While Co. B was thus engaged, Co. G had also had its share of "fun." Discovering a company of about eighty Yankees, Capt. Hutcheson with his company and part of Co. E, attacked them so vigorously, that they dared not run, and were so unnerved, that they fired volley after volley into the tree-tops. Capt. Hutcheson, who was a Chesterfield in manner, did not for a moment forget himself during the fight. "Charge them, gentlemen, charge them." "Aim low, gentlemen, aim at their waistbands," were his constant exhortations, until a portion of the enemy cried for quarters. "Throw down your arms, gentlemen, you scoundrels, throw them down." Sixteen obeyed the order, and the remainder taking advantage of the momentary cessation of hostilities, turned and fled. Bewildered, however, they took the wrong direction, and coming upon the 5th Texas where it was lying down in line-of-battle, they were greeted by a volley, which left not one standing. The fruits of Capt. H's victory, were eleven killed, several wounded, and sixteen prisoners, together with several stand of arms. While these events were transpiring, the 1st, 5th, and remainder of the 4th Texas had entered the timber, leaving the 18th Georgia to support the artillery in the rear. A Yankee regiment now appeared upon the left and rear of the skirmishers, with the intention, doubtless, of cutting them off. Here we witnessed for the first time,

THE GALLANTRY OF THE FIRST TEXAS.

The regiment now advancing, 1st California, evidently intended to fight well, and advanced steadily to within eighty paces of the 1st Texas, when they halted, poured in a volley, and with three huzzahs, attempted to charge. This was expected, and "aim low, fire," was ordered by Colonel Rainy, and a discharge followed that seemed to mow down the whole front rank, and sent the remainder in confusion back again. A whole-souled hearty yell now went up from the Texans, such as only Southerners can give, and they in turn, charged. But the Californians were not yet ready to yield, and rallying, they made a stubborn resistance, and for about twenty minutes, the fire raged with terrible fury. The Texans charged again, and the enemy broke and fled, leaving about two hundred killed and wounded on the field, and several prisoners in our hands. The loss of the 1st Texas in this engagement, was eleven killed and twenty-one wounded. Among the former, however, we regret to chronicle Lieutenant-Colonel Black and Captain Decatur, who were loved and mourned by all, as brave men. . . .

After the rout of this regiment, the enemy did not again attack us, but contented themselves with shelling us from their gunboats, and sweeping the woods with grape, from a battery they had planted upon the river bank, without, however, doing us the slightest injury. While this was going on, the boys had a hearty laugh at the conduct of an

who was attached to the 1st Texas Regiment. During the entire battle, with musketry, he had conducted himself in the most gallant manner, and had even succeeded in capturing a Yankee, whom he turned over to the proper officer, with the brief announcement, "Major, Yank yours, gun mine," and again participated in the struggle. When the first shell came tearing through the tree-tops, with its screaming inquiry, "where you, where you," he uttered a significant "ugh!" and listened until it burst. At that instant, another came, and exploded just over our heads, when he sprang to his feet, exclaiming, "no good for Indian," and made for the rear with the agility of an antelope. The boys did not, however, reproach him, because it has long been understood that Indians won't stand to be shot at by wagons, more particularly when the projectile itself shoots so terribly. The entire loss of the brigade in this engagement was thirty-seven. Of that number, Captain Denny, Commissary of the 5th, was killed by a picket, and two men captured, as previously related. Corporal Sapp, of Co. II, and private Spencer, of Co. G, 4th Texas, were wounded, all the other casualties were of the 1st Texas, of which regiment, we cannot speak too highly.— These are the men who came from their distant homes, at their own expense, before the President had called upon Texas for troops, to assist in this great struggle. And, though their names have not occupied a place in the journals of the day, they have ever been at their posts, ready and willing to do and die for our common cause. They are a lively, merry set, and though often hungry and “ragged,” they have shown in numberless instances, that they can march as far, and fight as hard, as any troops in the service.

THE ENEMY'S LOSS

in this engagement, as estimated by General Hood in his official report, was three hundred killed and wounded, and one hundred and twenty-six prisoners. McClellan's estimate is even greater, as he reported a loss of five hundred men and officers. This is probably correct, though a New York paper, which claims that the troops participating in this battle were chiefly from that section, viz: Albany, states the entire loss at twelve hundred. A correspondent of the New York “Herald,” writing from West Point soon after the fight, gravely asserts that they “were charged furiously by four regiments of negroes!” This paragraph caused considerable sport among the boys, being regarded as a direct reflection upon the state of the brigade toilet. The writer, however, was in probability, more knave than fool, for just at that period, the question of enlisting slaves in the United States army was being agitated, and such an assertion would not be without its effect on the unthinking masses of the North:

THE IMPORTANCE OF THIS BATTLE,

in reference to which, the Richmond papers have been silent, cannot be better illustrated than by reference to the language of some of our general officers. President Davis, in conversation with one of our Senators, said, in speaking of the Texas Brigade, “they saved the rear of our army, and the whole of our baggage train.”

General Gustavus W. Smith, in a letter to Colonel Horace Randall, writes, “the Texans won immortal honor for themselves, their

State, and for their commander, General Hood, at the battle of Eltham's Landing, near West Point. With forty thousand such men, I would not hesitate to invade the North, and would, before winter, make them sue for peace upon our terms, or destroy their whole country. But in praise of the Texas Brigade of my Division, I could talk a week, and then not say half they deserve. If the regiments now organized in Texas, could be transported here, and armed to-morrow, properly led, they would end the war in three months.

General Samuel W. Melton, also writes, "here we first had a fair sample of your Texans, under Hood. They are, incomparably, the best fighters in the Confederacy; men upon whom one could depend under all circumstances—who seem to fight for the very love of it. * * * Oh! that we had more of them. Forty thousand such men could march through Yankeedom now, from one end to the other, and conquer a peace in a month."

THE BRIGADE "CUTS DIRT," WHILE THE YANKEES DIG.

The fighting ended at 2 o'clock, P. M., and the enemy showing no disposition to leave their gunboats again, the brigade was ordered back from the bottom, leaving only a sufficient force for observation. Returning to the camp, from which we had started in the morning, we remained until 10 o'clock at night, when the whole army, baggage and all having passed up the road, we again assumed our position as the rear guard. Strict silence and quick time being enjoined, I am sure no troops ever marched more swiftly, or kept more obstinate silence than we did until daylight. How ludicrous the scene. What a hearty laugh a man could have had, had he been in a position to observe both armies that night. Ours, moving swiftly and stealthily along, casting many and anxious glances to the rear, fearing to discover the head of a pursuing column—theirs, digging, toiling and sweating, in preparing to receive the furious onslaught which they knew the "rebels" would make at daylight. Then to have watched the Yankees in the morning, feeling caustiously through the woods, listening every moment for the dreaded sound of the guns of troops, who were miles on their way to Richmond, and still going. Late in the afternoon of May 8th, the brigade was drawn up in line of battle, in the lawn, in front of Doctor Tyler's residence, five miles west of New Kent Court House, as the enemy were threatening to attack us. They did not, however, come up, and we remained here until the following evening, when we moved one mile up the road, and formed a new line of defence, to be held until our army could reach, and take its position in front of Richmond. About noon on ———, we decamped, and, though constantly in motion, only reached the Chickahominy, about six miles, by 1 o'clock at night. This was owing to the fact, that the road was blocked up by the rear of our artillery and baggage-train, and not daring to lie down or rest, we could only "mark time" in the rain and mud until the hour above mentioned, when all others having passed over, we reached the bridge. Here we found several Generals, with their attendant aids and couriers, all exhorting us to "close up," and for God's sake to hurry. This was more easily said, than done, for the roads had been cut by artillery and wagons, until a perfect mortar had been formed from one to three feet deep, and through this below, and a heavy soaking rain above, the men floundered on. At length, losing all patience, General Whiting dashed upon the bridge. "Hurry up, men, hurry up, don't mind a little mud." "D'ye call this a little mud! s'pose you git down and try it, stranger; I'll hold your horse." "Do you know whom you address, sir? I am General Whiting." "General ———, don't you reckon I know a General from a long-tongued courier?" says the fellow, as he disappeared in the darkness. This, repeated with sundry variations several times, at length discouraged the General, and leaving the Texans, whose spirits he had threatened to subdue, to cross as best they might, he rode away. Finally all were safely landed on this side the Chickahominy, and without waiting to eat or build fires, the men threw themselves upon the muddy ground, and slept soundly until morning. We occupied this point until evening, and then moved back about two miles, and bivouacked until the command was relieved, and marching to the rear, we camped at "Pine Island," three miles east of the city.— Nothing of interest occurred here. The men gave their whole attention to eating, sleeping, washing bodies and clothes, and watching the recruits who had recently arrived, attempting "balance and left." On Sunday, the Chaplain having just returned from Texas, where he had gone on recruiting service, we had Divine worship, which was remarkably well attended.

PREPARATIONS FOR THE MARCH—AGAIN.

May 26th.—Orders were issued to send off surplus baggage, which always accumulates with amazing facility when the camp is near a city or town. On the following evening at sunset we departed, and marching and "marking time" all night, we accomplished a distance of seven miles, and at dawn were halted one mile this side Chickahominy, on the Meadow Bridge road. Here we remained until the following day concealed in the woods, and then marched back and camped between the Mechanicsville Turnpike and Central railroad. On the next evening a most terrific thunderstorm, accompanied by torrents of rain, began and lasted through the night, thoroughly drenching the men. One man in the 4th Alabama Regiment, camped near us, was killed by lightning, and several were severely shocked. It was this storm which filled the Chickahominy, and suggested to General Johnston the movements which resulted in

THE BATTLE OF SEVEN PINES.

At six o'clock, May 31st, orders were received to march immediately, and in a few moments we were moving down the Nine-Mile road. Pursuing this road until within a mile and a half of the enemy, we halted, and until 2 o'clock, waited for the signal of battle, which was to be the roar of fire-arms on our right. It subsequently appeared that General Longstreet had begun the attack at, or near 9 o'clock, A. M., but owing to some atmospheric phenomenon, the sound of battle was not heard until five hours after, when the enemy had been driven from his position, and had fallen back near the York River railroad. As our movements were dependent on General Huger, we waited until 4 o'clock, when despairing of his arrival, the Brigade was formed in line of battle, with its left resting on the road, and ordered forward. Following, at some distance, to render what aid I could to any who might be wounded, I soon discovered that I had lost my Regiment in the swamps, and, as I could be of but little use alone against so many,

I immediately determined upon a "change of base," and started to the rear. The battle had now become terrible. Regiment after regiment, and brigade after brigade were thrown against their batteries, which, protected front and flank by earth-works, palisades, fallen timber and swamps, were almost impregnable. In passing to the rear, I met Generals Lee and Johnston and President Davis, riding at speed, and going, not only upon the field, but directly under the fire of the enemy's guns, which I could not but regard as imprudent, knowing how much depended upon their safety. Soon after, General Johnston was wounded. In storming these batteries, Whiting's Brigade suffered severely, and the name of the 4th Alabama was again written in letters of blood. All efforts however proved unavailing, and finally at 8½ o'clock, P. M., the firing ceased, and the weary soldiers slept upon their arms. At daylight, June 1st, the engagement was renewed, and by 9 o'clock, A. M., had become almost as general as on the day previous. The enemy having, during the night, strongly reinforced, were endeavoring to regain their lost position, but were repulsed in every instance. At 10 o'clock the firing ceased, leaving us in possession of all their positions and batteries, except one, several hundred prisoners, a large quantity of camp equipage, small arms, ammunition, &c.

HOW THE REBELS FIGHT.

The Cincinnati "Commercial" publishes an extract from a private letter, written by a member of Battery A, New York Artillery, in Casey's Division, better known as the "Napoleon Battery," in which the unyielding and irresistible prowess of our troops is described as something wonderful. If the writer had only stood to his gun a little longer, he would have learned still more of the fierce and dauntless resolution of brave men fighting for liberty and home. He is speaking of the battle of The Seven Pines:

"Our spherical case shot were awful missiles, each of them consisting of a clotted mass of seventy-six musket balls, with a charge of powder in the centre, that is fired with a fuse, the same as a shell. The missile first acts as a solid shot, ploughing its way through masses of men, and then exploding, hurls forward a shower of musket balls that mow down the foe in heaps. Our battery threw twenty-four of these a minute, and as we had the exact range of every part of the field, every shot told with frightful effect. But the enemy were not at all daunted—they marched steadily on, and hailed a perfect torrent of balls upon us. Why we, as well as our horses, were not every one shot down, will forever remain a mystery to me. We did not mind the leaden hail, however, but kept pouring our case-shot into the dense masses of the foe, who came on in prodigious and overwhelming force. And they fought splendidly, too. Our shot tore their ranks wide open, and shattered them asunder in a manner that was frightful to witness; but they closed up at once, and came on as steadily as English veterans. When they got within four hundred yards, we closed our case shot and opened on them with canister; and such destruction I never elsewhere witnessed. At each discharge, great gaps were made in their ranks—indeed, whole companies went down before that murderous fire; but they closed up with an order and discipline that was awe-inspiring. They seemed to be animated with the courage of despair, blended with the hope of a speedy victory, if they could by an overwhelming rush drive us from our position. It was awful to see their ranks torn and shattered by every discharge of canister that we poured right into their faces, and while their dead and dying lay in piles, closed up and still kept advancing right in the face of the fire. At one time, three lines, one behind the other, were steadily advancing, and three of their flags were brought in range of one of our guns, shotted with canister. “Fire!” shouted the gunner, and down went those three flags, and a gap was opened through those three lines as if a thunderbolt had torn through them, and the dead lay in swaths. But they at once closed up, and came steadily on, never halting or wavering, right through the woods, over the fence, through the field, right up to our guns, and, sweeping everything before them, captured every piece. When we delivered our last fire, they were within fifteen or twenty paces of us, and, as all of our horses were either killed or wounded, we could not carry off a gun. Our whole division was cut to pieces, with what loss I do not know. We fell back to a second line of entrenchments, and there held the enemy in check until reinforcements arrived, and then we kept our position till night put an end to the battle.”

The Texas Brigade was not directly engaged during this battle, although under fire during a great part of both days. Much dissatisfaction was expressed by the men at having had so much "double quicking" through swamps and fallen timber, and no opportunity to vent their wrath upon the enemy. The Confederate loss in this battle was about four thousand five hundred in killed, wounded and missing. The enemy subsequently admitted a loss of nearly ten thousand. After occupying the field until the evening of June 2d, our forces fell back to their old line of defences, and the Yankees re-occupied their old ground. This afforded a fine scope for the lying talent of McClellan, and he immediately published a flaming report of a three day's battle, professing to have re-taken on the third day all he had previously lost, and stating that he had driven our routed and panic-stricken army into the very lines of the city; but neglects to state why he did not immediately perfect his "on to Richmond." Of this third day's battle our army was entirely ignorant as there were no guns fired, and no "brilliant bayonet charges" made. After this battle the Texas Brigade was thrown to the front, and detailed each day as scouts, sharpshooters and spies—two hundred men and the requisite number of officers. These men operated beyond, and independently of the regular pickets, and soon became a terror to the enemy. On the morning of the 7th, a party of one hundred and fifty Texans, under command of Lieut. Jamison, of the 1st Texas, Lieut. Barziza, of the 4th, and Lieut. Nash, of the 5th, were ordered by Gen. Hood to drive in the enemy's pickets, and ascertain, as far as practicable, what the main body were doing. They immediately proceeded to carry out his instructions, and attacked the Yankee outposts with such fury, that they fled, "pell mell," running over in their flight a Regiment of Infantry, which was supporting them.—The regiment, thinking from indications which they saw, that at least half the "rebels" were coming, also took to their heels, and for half a mile made regular "Bull Run time." Having at length discovered that they were flying from a mere squad, they rallied, formed and opened on our boys with a will, but were so promptly answered that they dared not advance. Here, securely protected by trees, the Texans poured an effective fire into their dense ranks, and would probably have given them another chase, had they not discovered a Yankee Regiment moving up on their left flank. This necessitated a retrograde movement, which they promptly executed, fighting front and flank, as they fell back to the cover of our batteries. The enemy afterwards confessed a loss of between forty-five and fifty in this skirmish, while ours was but six, in killed and wounded—none missing. So successful was this foray, that Gen'l Hood issued an order complimenting the men and officers. Among our killed on this occasion was Mr. ——— Davis, an amateur, who was widely known in Eastern Texas, as an editor of ability and promise. His fall was regretted by all who knew him, as his gallant conduct in the field and social qualities in camp had endeared him to all. A few days after this affair, some of our scouts penetrated the Yankee lines, by “relieving” one of their pickets, to see what they could “pick up.” Just as the gray of dawn appeared, a Yankee Lieutenant Colonel, officer of the day, visiting his pickets, rode up to a member of the 18th Georgia, who promptly presented for his inspection the muzzle of his rifle, and at the same time enjoining silence. “You fool,” exclaimed the indignant officer, “I am Lieut. Col. ———, of the ———th New York Regiment.” “Ah,” said Georgia, “Well now, Colonel, that’s just what I was thinking; and as it’s rainin’ a little, I think I’ll take you in ‘out of the wet.’ Let’s have your pistol and sword, if you please.” No alternative was left the chagrined “Yank;” and the elated Georgian marched him to Gen. Hood’s headquarters, where he turned him over, and received his fine “Colt” for his trouble.

HOO! FOR STONEWALL JACKSON.

On the morning of June 11th, orders were received to be in readiness to move at 5 P. M., which we did, passing through Richmond and over James River to the Danville Depot, where we remained until 8 A. M., the following morning. We then took the cars, and in twenty-four hours arrived at Lynchburg. Here we remained until the 15th, when we were moved to Charlottesville, and thence, on the 18th, to Staunton. On the 19th, marching orders were issued, and the 20th we started back towards Charlottesville. “Where are we going?” now became the popular question; but, alas! no one could answer it. Some ‘guessed’ to the Valley, some to Alexandria, some to flank McClellan, &c.; but no one knew. That all possibility of our plan being discovered might be destroyed, orders were issued by General Jackson that if any one asked a question, to answer, "I don't know." After a few miles of our march had been accomplished, our Brigade was halted, and General Hood delivered General Jackson's orders to us verbally. "Now," said he, "you will often be asked, Where are you going? Where from? Who are you? &c.; and you must answer, 'I don't know.' In fact, you need not give a direct answer to any one."— This was just as much license as the men wanted, and they forthwith knew nothing of the past, present, or future. On the following day General Jackson noticed a "straggler" making for a cherry tree, near the road. Riding up, he asked, "Where are you going, sir?" "I don't know." "To what command do you belong?" "I don't know." "Well, what State are you from?" "I don't know." The General was evidently fast losing patience, when another "straggler" explained the matter. "Old Stonewall and General Hood issued orders yesterday that we were not to know anything until after the next fight, and we are not going to disobey orders." The General said no more, but rode on in silence, reflecting, no doubt, upon the perversity of human nature in general, and soldiers in particular, thinking it unnecessary to ask the soldier if he knew the way to the cherry tree. As we neared Gordonsville, the problem of our destination grew intensely interesting. Would we turn to the left or the right—move on Washington or Richmond. Soon the enigma, which had roused up many a drowsy brain, was solved. The head of the iron-horse turned towards the South. The Chickahominy was the theatre of action. Leaving the railroad at Frederick Hall, we moved in as many columns as there were roads towards Ashland, and for the want of roads we sometimes marched through fields and woods, where we arrived on the evening of the 25th, and drove in the Yankee pickets. Orders were received that night to move at 3 A. M., which we did, taking the Hanover road. During the morning, the sound of cannon could be distinctly heard, and each discharge quickened the step of our men. Sharpshooters and skirmishers were in advance, and occasionally the clear crack of a rifle announced that some "Bucktail"* had received his quietus, or saved himself by flight. At 3 P. M., we reached a small creek, on the opposite side of which our scouts reported two Regiments ambuscaded. The bridge, a wooden structure, was burning when we arrived, and the sound of axes could be plainly heard in the timber ahead, where the enemy were obstructing the road.—Riley's Battery was immediately thrown forward and shelled the timber, forcing the Yankees to save themselves by a precipitate flight, leaving a number of axes on the ground and sticking in the trees they had been chopping. Just then an amusing scene took place. A number of darkies, who understand the use of the hoe better than the fire-lock, were at work in the field a little to our rear. When the first shot was fired from the "big gun," they let all holts loose and started for the house, which was still further to the rear, screaming and running for dear life, as if they thought the old-boy was after them. And from our position, it was hard to tell which made the better time, they or the Yankees. Having at length rebuilt the bridge and crossed the artillery, we proceeded cautiously for some two or three miles, and halted for the night in line of battle.

DESCRIPTION OF THE FIELD, AND PLAN OF ATTACK.

Before proceeding with the important events now ready for development, which are to change the entire aspect of the campaign, and send the "Young Napoleon" howling back to his patron, it becomes necessary to give the reader some idea of the position of the two opposing armies. That all may readily understand this, I transcribe from "The Seven Days Battles around Richmond," the following simple explanation: "Place your hand upon the table with the index finger pointing a little north of east. Spread your fingers so that the tips will form the arc of a circle. Imagine Richmond as situated on your wrist; the outer edge of your thumb as the Central Railroad, the inner edge as the Mechanicsville Turnpike, first finger as the Nine Mile or New Bridge road, the second as the Williamsburg Pike, running nearly parallel with the York River railroad—the railroad running between the two fingers. The third as the Charles City Turnpike, (which runs to the southward of the White Oak Swamp,) and the fourth as the Darbytown road. The radius of this arc averaging about seven miles to Richmond.—Commanding these several avenues were the forces of McClellan.

Our own troops, except those under Jackson, occupied a similar position, but of course a smaller circle immediately around the city; the heaviest body being on the centre, south of the York River railroad.

BATTLE OF MECHANICSVILLE, THURSDAY, JUNE 27TH.

The morning dawned bright and beautiful. All arrangements being completed, Jackson's forces moved down between the Chickahominy and Pamunkey, driving the enemy before them, until the front of General Branch was so far uncovered as to allow him to cross at Brooke Turnpike, and marching down the north side of the stream, uncovering the front of Gen'l A. P. Hill, as he attacked the enemy at Mechanicsville. This division crossed at the Meadow Bridge about 4 P. M., and uniting with the command of General Branch, immediately attacked the enemy and drove them from their strong positions. Here they had erected formidable earthworks, and mounted upon them were heavy siege guns, and the storming of these defences is justly reckoned among the most gallant and bloody scenes of the campaign. The indomitable valor of our troops soon sent the Yankees flying, and mounting their works, the Confederates turned their own guns upon them with terrible effect. The loss on both sides was heavy, but when we view the nature of the struggle, it is a matter of wonder how any of our troops escaped destruction. About a mile farther down was another formidable battery of sixteen guns, supported by heavy bodies of infantry, who were protected by rifle pits, abattis, and the bed of Beaver Dam Creek, which passed in front and to their left flank.— This position was attacked with a furious onset. The charge was made on the rifle pits, but the creek and abattis which still intervened rendered the capture impracticable. At this juncture the batteries took a commanding position, and over the heads of our troops poured into the infantry such a storm of shot and shell as almost to silence their fire, and to entirely distract the attention of their battery from our infantry. No further advance was, however, attempted that night, and, at 10 o'clock, P. M., both batteries ceased firing. Soon afterwards the enemy abandoned his position, leaving some of his disabled guns upon the field. During the night, was fully completed, and extended for miles over hills and plains, woods and valleys, the different commands taking positions as follows: Jackson on the extreme left, next D. H. Hill, then Ewell, Whiting and A. P. Hill, while Longstreet moved down, with his right resting upon the swamps of the Chickahominy. Early in the afternoon, a scattering fire of skirmishers was heard on the right. About 2 P. M. several of our batteries were placed in position, and opened with a view to attract attention from Longstreet and A. P. Hill on the right; but they were soon overpowered and driven from the field. It was now discovered that McClellan had made a strong stand on Gaines' Farm, and was determined to hold it, if possible. His position was an awkward one. The left wing fronting Richmond westward, and his right at angles, and to the rear, facing north.

General Longstreet crossed the Chickahominy, and formed a junction with the two Generals Hill.

OUR LINE OF BATTLE ON FRIDAY MORNING

THE BATTLE OF GAINES' FARM, FRIDAY, JUNE 27TH.

At 4 o'clock, P. M., Longstreet commenced the fight, driving the enemy down the Chickahominy. This was the signal for a general assault, and in quick succession Hill, Whiting and Ewell took up the fire; and the work of death begun. This part of the day's work is correctly given in the "Whig" of the 30th, as follows:

"Gen'l A. P. Hill's Division, supported by Gen'l Pickett's Brigade from Longstreet's Division, made the first assault upon the enemy's works, which were of the most formidable character, and seemingly impregnable. Brigade after brigade advanced upon the fortification, and delivered their fire, but were compelled to fall back under the terrific fire of the Yankees, who were comparatively secure from danger behind their works, and poured volley after volley into our brave troops. After the fight had been prolonged for several hours, without result, Gen'l Whiting's Division, now of Jackson's corps d'armee, advanced to the assault, and after a desperate charge, succeeded in dislodging the Yankees. As they fled from their works, they had to pass through an open field, about two hundred yards in width, before reaching the woods. Several of our regiments fired at the fugitives and killed a very large number of them. The field was nearly covered with the dead and wounded Yankees. The regiments composing Whiting's Division are the 4th Alabama, 11th Mississippi, 6th North Carolina, 2d Mississippi, 1st, 4th and 5th Texas, 18th Georgia, and Hampton's Legion. It was now nearly dark, and though the pursuit was continued for some time, it was deemed inexpedient to follow the wretches through the swamp, to which they fled, and, accordingly, our men were recalled."

In the "Examiner" of July 2d, appears the following article, which, in view of the many reports in circulation, I insert as an act of justice to those noble men who contributed so largely to the success of that memorable day.

THE FIGHT AT GAINES' FARM—AN OFFICER'S STATEMENT.

There have been many confused and contradictory statements of the forces engaged in the attacks of the enemy's works near Gaines' Farm on last Friday. We have received the following statement from an officer on the subject of this doubt:

"At about two o'clock on Friday evening last, I reached the lines of the enemy's entrenchments near Gaines' farm. A fierce struggle was then going on between A. P. Hill's Division and the garrison of the line of defence. Repeated charges were made by Hill's troops, but the formidable character of the works, and murderous volleys of grape and canister from the artillery covering them, kept our troops in check.

"It was about half-past four o'clock when Pickett's Brigade came to Hill's support. Pickett's Regiments fought with the most determined valor. At five o'clock Whiting's Division, composed of the 'Old Third' and Texas Brigades, advanced at a 'double-quick,' charged them, routed them, and captured their artillery.

"The struggle was brief, but, perhaps, the most bitter of the war. Fully one-fourth of the entire division were cut down in this gallant charge.

"The brave Texans were led by Brigadier-General Hood, and the 'Old Third Brigade' by the dashing Colonel Law, late commander, of the Fourth Alabama.

"The works carried by these noble troops would have been invincible to the bayonet had they been garrisoned by men.

"Whiting's Division is composed of Hood's Brigade—First, Fourth and Fifth Texas, and Hampton Legion and Eighteenth Georgia, and Colonel Law's Brigade—Fourth Alabama, Second and Eleventh Mississippi, and Sixth North Carolina.

"I mention these Regiments because their names will be historical."

That the reader may have an idea of the manner in which each Regiment of Whiting's Division acted, I transfer from the "Whig" a letter written by Wauzee, which, in its more prominent facts, is strictly correct:

BATTLE FIELD, NEAR CHICKAHOMINY, }
June 28th, 1862. }

TO THE EDITOR OF THE WHIG:

It was early in the evening when your correspondent reached the enemy's main line of defence. Their position skirted a strip of dense woods, while to their front extended a vast undulating plain, ploughed up, here and there, with deep gullies and wood-girt water courses. That they were entrenched we knew, but of the nature of their works, owing to the deep foliage that screened them from view, we knew but little. It was absolutely necessary, however, that we should carry their line, and to do this, regiment after regiment, and brigade after brigade, were successively led forward; still our repeated charges, gallant and dashing though they were, failed to accomplish the end, and our troops, still fighting, fell steadily back.

Thus, for more than two mortal hours, the momentous issue stood trembling in the balance. The sun was getting far in the west—darkness would soon be upon us, and that point must be carried.

At this juncture—it was now 5 o'clock—the division of the gallant Whiting hove in sight. This division is composed of the brave Texan Brigade, under Hood, and the old Third Brigade, commanded by the dashing Law, of Manassas memories.

On reaching the field these troops were rapidly deployed in line of battle, when Colonel Law detached Colonel Stone's regiment, the 2d Mississippi, and sent it some distance to the right, where it successfully resisted, with heavy loss, a flank attack from the enemy. The 6th North Carolina, (Major Webb) he held in reserve: then taking the 4th Alabama (Colonel McLemore) and 11th Mississippi (Colonel Liddell) he led a dashing charge upon the enemy's entrenched position.

This charge was made under the most galling fire that I ever witnessed—shot and shell, grape, canister and ball, swept through our lines like a storm of leaden hail, and our noble boys fell thick and fast; yet, still, with the irresistible determination of men who fight for all that men hold dear, our gallant boys rushed on.

Suddenly, a halt was made—there was a deep pause, and the line wavered from right to left. We now saw the character of the enemy's works. A ravine, deep and wide, yawned before us, while on the other side, at the crest of the almost perpendicular bank, a breastwork of logs was erected, from behind which the dastard invaders were pouring murderous volleys upon our troops.

This position was, perhaps, the most formidable of the kind that was ever built. Scaling ladders and boarding pikes would have been far better adapted to its reduction than bayonets, and had the wretched Hessians, who garrisoned it, done half their "duty," they might have held it until doomsday.

The pause made by our troops, however, was but a brief breathing space. The voice of Colonel Law was heard—"Forward, boys! Charge them!" and with a wild, mad shout, our impetuous soldiery dashed forward, flinging themselves into the trench, struggling up the precipitate bank, climbing over the breastworks, and driving the flying foe terror-stricken before them.

In this charge, the 6th North Carolina came up, and it, uniting with Law's other regiments, formed a junction with the 18th Georgia and 4th Texas, of Hood's Brigade. These five regiments then made a brilliant charge on the plain beyond the works, capturing two batteries, and turning some of the guns on the enemy before he could make good his escape.

The rout was absolute, but night coming on deprived us of most of the fruits of the victory.

A little after dusk some apprehensions were entertained lest the enemy should make a night attack and attempt to retake the batteries we had captured, but to meet this emergency, General Anderson, at the united request of Colonel Law and Colonel Jenkins, gave permission to Colonel Law to detach Jenkin's regiment, which he joined with one of his own, and successfully repulsed a flank assault. All the artillery we took is secured.

General Whiting has won imperishable fame—wherever the fight raged fiercest there was he, urging his gallant troops to victory.

All is quiet now. There is no demoralization among our men.—We are ready to renew the conflict at any moment.”

They “paused and wavered” long enough for the 4th Texas to pass them. And but a few men of the 11th Mississippi, were all of the 3d Brigade, who were with the 4th Texas and 18th Georgia when they took the last battery.

The following letter from “Chickahominie,” is introduced as an act of justice to the 18th Georgia, (better known in the brigade as the “3rd Texas,”) as gallant a regiment as ever fought beneath a Confederate flag:

THE EIGHTEENTH GEORGIA REGIMENT.

CAMP 18TH GEORGIA REGIMENT, HOOD'S BRIGADE, }
Twenty-five Miles from Richmond. }

TO THE EDITOR OF THE WHIG:—For the Gratification of the relatives and friends of the members of this regiment, I desire to give a brief account of the particular part enacted by them on Friday, 27th June, in the engagement at Coal Harbor or Gaines' Mill. Having been with them through the whole action, and taken part in them, your correspondent had perhaps a better opportunity than any one else of knowing exactly what they did. It will be remembered that the fight began early in the afternoon and was raging with great fury while Hood's Brigade was yet a considerable distance from the scene. Marching rapidly through the woods and fields, apparently with a view to turn the enemy's extreme right. The whole brigade was halted about 4 o'clock and formed in line of battle in the following order, 18th Georgia, 1st Texas, 4th Texas, 5th Texas. The position of the 4th Texas was subsequently changed to the right of the 18th, in this order the brigade advanced through the woods, which being so very thick we soon lost sight of all except our own regiment. Advancing across a deep muddy swamp, and up a steep ascent, they were placed in position to support a battery and ordered to lay down. Here they were just in range of a heavy battery of the enemy, and the missiles fell so thick that our battery soon became disabled and had to withdraw. Another came up but was also compelled to retire after a few rounds. After which, the regiment was ordered to change position, moving by the right flank at double quick. They remained behind this battery about thirty minutes and lost some twenty or thirty men killed and wounded. After marching by the flank for about a half mile, they were halted in an open space to the right of a piece of woods and in rear of an apple orchard and formed in line of battle. Then advancing under a shower of shot and shell down a long slope which was completely commanded by a body of the enemy's infantry on their left, posted on a wooded eminence on the opposite side of the ravine at the foot of the slope. Here we lost many more men but passed on without returning the fire of the enemy poured into our ranks, and crossing the ravine at the point where the 4th Texas had so gallantly driven the enemy back, advanced up the steep hill on the opposite side, and here, for the first time, obtained a view of the terrible work that then remained for them to do.— Several regiments claim to have taken batteries, and no doubt justly too, for there was enough for all to have a showing. Several had been taken up to the moment the 18th reached the crest of the hill, but the main battery on the hill in the field, said to be the Hoboken Battery of fourteen splendid brass pieces, which was filling the air with its deadly missiles, and dealing destruction all around, whose position is said to have been chosen by McClellan himself, and whose guns, according to the account of numerous prisoners and wounded men, had been directed by him, was still playing with terrible effect. It was supported by a large body of infantry in the rear, and a detachment of the 2nd Regular Cavalry on the left, besides the approach to it was completely commanded by two other batteries. So admirable was this disposition of the forces and the natural conformation of the ground, that McClellan is said to have assured his men that it was impregnable.— In front of the 18th, at the moment it came in sight of the battery, lay a long sloping hill, at the foot of which, some three hundred yards distant, was a deep, and in some places, an impassable ditch, then a quick rise, that afforded some protection from the guns above. Preceding regiments had done their work well, and gallantly had they driven the enemy from some of its strongest works and taken several batteries. Some had even advanced on this battery, but found their forces so much scattered, after crossing the ditch, that they became powerless, and could do little else than seek protection under the crest of the hill from the guns above.— Down this first slope the 18th advanced in splendid order, at double quick, under a cross fire from two batteries on the right and left and a terrible direct fire from the battery in front. Shot after shot tore through the ranks, leaving wide gaps, which were quickly closed up; the clear, shrill voices of Major Griffis and Adjutant Patton could be distinctly heard amid the bursting of shells and whistling of shots, coolly commanding, “close up;” “Dress to the right” or “left,” while every other officer exerted himself to preserve the line unbroken. Dead and wounded men fell on every side, while the living pushed on to the work before them. Here Lieutenant L. A. McCulloch, of Co. C, Jackson County Volunteers, fell terribly mangled with a shell. Lieutenant Sillman, who succeeded him in command of the company, was wounded a few steps farther on, Lieutenant Callahan taking command of the company.— Lieutenant John Grant, commanding Co. II, was also wounded and left, the command devolving on 1st Sergeant Cotton. On reaching the ditch, the line was necessarily broken, the men being compelled to get across as best they could. Advancing a short distance, they found themselves under cover of the hill in company with a detachment of various other regiments who were in a broken and disorganized condition. Some had lost their leaders, some their regiments, and all, for the time being, seemed, to have lost their organization. In front of all these the colors of the 18th was planted, and the men quickly rallied and formed. A short consultation among the officers was held to secure concert of action, after which, a small detachment of the 11th, Mississippi, under the command of Colonel Liddell, formed in support of the right, and another from the 4th Texas, under Captain Townsend, supported the left. Thus supported, at the command “forward,” the 18th moved steadily up the hill in the very jaws of Death itself! As soon as they were discovered the enemy’s cavalry made a desperate charge at the right wing, which might have broken and ruined the line, had they not been received with so much coolness and deliberation by the gallant men composing Companies A, B and C, commanded respectively by Captains O'Neal, Stewart and Lieutenant Callahan, who held their fire until the enemy were within good range, and then poured in a deadly volley, that broke their front, brought down their leader, and so discomfited them that they changed their direction and endeavored to make their escape, but before they succeeded in doing so, scores of their saddles were emptied and many a crippled steed left hobbling across the field. Just as this charge was made the left wing had come up within range of the guns; when one of them delivered a volley of grape full into the ranks of Co. K, instantly killing Lieutenant Dowten and a private, and wounding half a dozen others. The whole line halted to deliver their fire, which they did so effectually that for a moment the firing of the battery ceased, and the infantry began to fall back. Seizing the opportunity, Colonel Ruff ordered the charge, and rushing to the front, bat in hand, waived the boys onward, and, in less time than it takes to write it, nine pieces of the battery was theirs.— At this moment, the scene in front was indescribable. Cavalrymen, artillery limbers and caissons and infantry all rushed away in one wild sea of confusion, running for dear life. Some few cannoniers, however, stood to their guns and continued to load—one was shot at the piece while raming down a cartridge—another, while adjusting a friction primer, was shot down by private Monroe Windsor, of Co. H, and his bag of friction primers captured by him. Lieutenant Lawes, of Co. D, with four men, rushed forward and shot the men at one piece while they were on the eve of firing it. Corporal Foster, of Co. F, deserves great credit for the gallantry with which he bore the battle flag to the front—ever foremost. When he reached the battery, he mounted one of the pieces and waved his flag in triumph, but as soon as the regiment was again ordered forward in pursuit of the enemy, he took his place and rushed on. At this point, Colonel Ruff, seeing that his regiment had pierced the enemy's lines to a considerable distance, left Major Griggs in command, and stopped to rally stragglers, who were constantly coming up, and turn their fire to the left, whence the enemy were pouring a hot fire on the men about the guns. The regiment followed and drove the enemy about four hundred yards into the woods, when it was thought advisable for them to fall back, as they were entirely unsupported, and had pierced the enemy's lines about a mile, and there was a considerable body of the enemy in the rear, both on the right and left. Fortunately, our forces drove these back about night, and the 18th held its position for the night, sleeping between the pieces and the enemy. The regiment was under fire for about three hours, and lost one hundred and forty-eight in killed and wounded. Two officers killed and six wounded. Carried into action five hundred and seven men. Every officer and man acted with great gallantry and coolness. Captain Armstrong, seeing one of the guns aimed at his company, saved them by an oblique movement to the right in double quick. Captain Maddox led his company through the fight, though so badly wounded as to have to retire to the rear immediately after the engagement was over. Lieutenant S. V. Smith, Co. K, led his company with great coolness, notwithstanding his loss was very heavy. At the ditch in front of the battery, he found fugitive Yankees so thick that he had to make them get out of his way and allow his men to pass. Lieutenant Hardin, commanding Co. F, manœvered his company finely, and did splendid service. Orderly Ransour, commanding Co. E, acted very gallantly. The regiment took about two hundred prisoners, among them one Colonel and several Captains and Lieutenants.—The commander of the cavalry that charged our lines and who fell into our hands a wounded prisoner, declared he had as leave charge a wall of fire.

The foregoing extracts sufficiently illustrate the part enacted by Whiting's command, and show, beyond question, that all did their duty unflinchingly; but I desire to speak now, more particularly of the conduct of the 4th Texas Regiment on that occasion. While Hood's Brigade was formed in line of battle, the 4th Texas was held in partial reserve, and soon became separated from the other regiments of the brigade. After remaining in the rear, lying down, for perhaps half an hour, General Hood came for us, and moving by the right flank about half a mile, halted us in an open space to the right of some timber, and in rear of an apple orchard. The sight which we here beheld, beggars description. The ground was strewn with the dead and dying, while our ranks were broken at every instant by flying and panic stricken soldiers. In front of us was the "Old 3d Brigade," who, but a few moments before, had started with cheers to storm the fatal palisade. But the storm of iron and lead was too severe, they "wavered" for a moment, and fell upon the ground. At this instant, General Hood, who, had in person, taken command of our regiment, commanded in his clear ringing voice, "Forward, quick, march," and onward moved the little band of five hundred, with the coolness of veterans. Here Colonel Marshall fell dead from his horse, pierced by a minnie ball.—Volleys of musketry, and showers of grape, canister and shell ploughed through us, but were only answered by the stern "close up—close up to the colors," and onward they rushed over the dead and dying, and over the 3d Brigade, without a pause, until within about one hundred yards of the breast-works. We had reached the apex of the hill, and some of the men seeing the enemy just before them, commenced discharging their pieces. It was at this point, that preceeding brigades had halted, and beyond which none had gone, in consequence of the terrible concentrated fire of the concealed enemy. At this critical juncture, the voice of General Hood was heard above the din of battle, "Forward, forward, charge right down on them, and drive them out with the bayonet." Fixing bayonets as they moved, they made one grand rush for the fort; down the hill, across the creek and fallen timber, and the next minute saw our battle flag planted upon the captured breast-work. The cowardly foe, frightened at the rapid approach of pointed steel, rose from behind their defences, and started up the hill at speed. One volley was poured into their backs, and it seemed as if every ball found a victim, so great was the slaughter. Their works were ours, and, as our flag moved from the first to the second tier of defences, a shout arose from the shattered remnant of that regiment, and which will long be remembered by those who heard it; a shout which announced that the wall of death was broken, and victory, which had hovered doubtfully for hours over that bloody field, had at length perched upon the battle flag of the 4th Texas. Right and left it was taken up and rang along the lines for miles; long after many of those who had started it, were in eternity.

No pause was made here, but onward and upward they pressed. At the summit of the hill, the gallant Lieutenant-Colonel, Warwick, fell mortally wounded, while grasping in his hand a Confederate battle flag, which had been deserted by some regiment near where we began the charge. No noble death, no brighter destinies could have been asked by a soldier. Falling at the head of brave men, in the hour of victory, and in defence of his native city, his name will be forever cherished in its annals, and proudly written in the history of his country. Just in front, and about four hundred yards distant, was a splendid battery of fifteen guns, and without halting, they made on in that direction. They had proceeded but a short distance, when General Hood discovered an attempt by the enemy on the right to flank and cut off the 4th.—Gathering up the stragglers near, he formed sufficient opposition to hold them in check until the regiment have time to reform its line, and then moved forward, having been joined by a portion of the 11th Mississippi. In a depression in the field about half-way from this position to the battery, they halted, where they were joined by the 18th Georgia. Captain Townsend now led the 4th—Major Key, the last field officer, retiring with a painful wound, left him in command. Forming on the left of the 18th—a squadron of about six hundred cavalry, at full speed, charged down the slope upon the right. A “look out for the cavalry,” was sufficient to put them on the alert, and they received them in splendid style. Soon their horses were running wildly over the fields, many without riders, and others frantic from bayonet cuts and minnie balls. The line of retreat was well defended by fallen steeds and dead Yankees. But the boys felt more sympathy for the poor horse than for the degraded rider, who was left bleeding and mangled, to bite the dust. The charge upon the battery was continued, and the work was soon over—for rushing forward at a run, while the hill-tops blazed and thundered like a bursting mountain, and pouring a storm of grape and canister through their advancing ranks, they drove the enemy from their guns. The infantry, cavalry and cañonniers, with five guns, mixed and moving at their utmost speed, gave to the mind the idea of GRAND CONFUSION! as they moved off in search of the new “base,” which McClellan had just gone in haste to select. Our Confederate battle flag now floated over the guns where the Stars and Stripes with the "Spread Eagle," had so recently hovered over the Young Napoleon's head.— But they rested only a few moments here. For the sight of the broken and flying columns of the enemy invited them forward, and they pressed the rear of the Grand Army in its "On from Richmond," as it makes its grand charge to the rear, where safety is to be won by a gallant run, until night puts an end to the slaughter. These two flags might have remained to guard the trophies won and cannon captured on this memorable hill, and would ever have been the pride of the States they represent, but they hastened to make their victory still more complete.

The Hampton Legion entered the fight on the left of the Brigade, on the crest of the hill in the woods. The 5th Texas next, then the 1st, and engaged the enemy from left to right in great fury, slowly pressing him back, and almost covering the ground with the dead from their ranks.

To decide the points of honor for our Brigade on that bloody ground, we have but to offer the testimony of General Whiting, who commanded the Division. He says: "The 1st Texas and Hampton Legion were sent in as hundreds, were leaving in disorder.— Two regiments, one South Carolina and one Louisiana, were marching back from the field, and the 1st Texas was ordered to go through or over them, which they did. When the line was completed and advanced to the crest of the hill, a brigade was skulking and hiding from danger, and never advanced from the west side of the ravine. Fourteen pieces of artillery were taken, and nearly a whole regiment of men were turned over by Col. Robertson, of the 5th Texas, to Brigadier General Prior or staff.

"Brigadier General Anderson supporting on the right. The troops on my immediate left I do not know, and am glad I don't. I have reason to believe that the greater part of them never left the cover of the woods, on the west side of the ravine.

"I take pleasure in calling special attention to the 4th Texas Regiment, which, led by Brig. Hood, was the first to break the enemy's line, and enter his works. Its brave old Colonel, Marshall, fell early in the charge, on the hither side of the ravine. The stubborn resistance maintained all day faltered from that moment, and the day was gained. Of the other Regiments of the Division, it would be invidious and unjust, to mention one before another."

General Hood says, "directing in person the 4th Texas, they were the first to pierce the strong line of breast-works occupied by the enemy, which caused great confusion in their ranks. And here the 18th Georgia, commanded by Colonel Ruff, came to the support of the 4th, pressed over the hotly contested field, inclining from right to left, with the 5th Texas on their left, taking a large number of prisoners, and fourteen pieces of artillery. The guns were taken by the 4th Texas and 18th Georgia, and the prisoners by the 5th Texas."

There were many regiments who claimed the honor of capturing these guns, but in justice to the men who did the work, both the Division and Brigade Commanders have settled the question. We may here remark, that five of the guns spoken of were captured by the 4th, at the time they stormed and took the first and second breast-works.

There were but few who failed to do their duty well. And as for those officers and men who "skulked and hid in ditches and in the woods from danger," we will leave them with their superiors, and on the historian will devolve the task of assigning them position in the back ground, and let their deeds screen them from the world's view.

The secret of our success is found, in a great measure, in the discretion exercised by Hood at the moment we reached the top of the hill, upon which so many had fallen before us. Where, instead of halting and making the fight, as others had done and been driven back, he gave the word, and our brave men rushed headlong from the hill, and at short range, and with cold steel drove the enemy from their hiding places below.

VIEW OF THE BATTLE-FIELD.

Our victory was complete. Hundreds of prisoners were sent to the rear, and thousands were left lying on the field and scattered through the woods, weltering in their blood, while hundreds more were left dead upon the soil their feet had polluted. And now we must give them graves in the very fields they have pillaged. Night has hung its dark curtains around and over the arena so recently lit with fire-arms, and the flash of the glittering sabre in the hands of valient men. The roar and rush of armies has ceased. All is quiet as the grave, only when disturbed by busy trains of ambulances, and the heart-rending groans of the ten thousand sufferers, co-mingling their voices in piteous discord on every hand. No troopers are dashing headlong, and not a single roar of the cannon is to be heard. But low, deep murmurs rose upon the gloom of night, which lent to the surrounding scene the darkest shade to which earth-born sufferers are heir in their brief stay in a world of sin and woe. Nothing this side the regions of blackness of darkness is half so terrible as the teatro upon which the maddened armies of empires seek revenge, and settle their quarrels. The darkness of the night, intensified by the clouds of smoke now settling down upon the earth, with the cries of the suffering and groans of the dying, tend to deepen and blacken the pall that shrouds the mind of the wounded soldier. Thoughtful and suffering, on the cold ground where he fell, he longs for the coming morning. But he knows not that it shall dawn upon him. Exhausted, hungry, bleeding, famishing, and no one to fill his canteen, or bind up his broken arm or shattered leg. It is a long, long and dreary night; and beyond he knows not that he shall have another day. And, although hours are dark and the cannon's roar is not to be heard, yet every watch was disturbed, and the sentinel hears the groans of his suffering comrades all night long. Many tears were shed under the long shadows of each hour of that night, that will never be numbered on earth, and that too from eyes all unused to weeping. Oh! how sweet the comforts of religion in an hour like this. Friends walked and looked for friends, and brothers knew not the fate of each other, whether living or dead. Long trains of ambulances are passing to and fro nearly all night, gathering and carrying to the field Infirmary—to which place we will now go to see if there are any there we know. Yes, there is one, and yonder another, and another, but we will not call their names—the whole yard is filled with suffering friends, stretched upon the ground.—Nurses are washing and bathing their wounds, and surgeons are using the knife. Many arms and legs are amputated, and the poor boys are maimed for life.

The long-desired morning comes at last, and with it hundreds more are brought in. They are carried to the surrounding shades, in the orchard and field. These are some of the horrors of war, while the counterpart is found at the home of the soldier's mother, his wife and friends. But upon this sacred ground we will not tread. For we imagine we see them, when the letter with the black seal reaches their anxious and trembling hand, while the heart's deepest fountain is broken up and gushes forth in streams of such grief as none can portray. Oh God, how long shall such scenes as this afflict our unhappy land? How long till thou wilt put a stop to the shedding of human blood? Thus ends the battle of Gaines' Farm.

But we had not finished the strife when the sun went down on Friday. Each day for a week we must witness the ré-enactment of this bloody drama. On Saturday, from the hill on which we captured the heavy battery of the enemy the evening before, we could see the consternation of McClellan's army. Clouds of rolling dust wound their serpentine course over hills and valleys, along every road leading away from the position he had occupied, towards the south and east; and they, together with the mountains of smoke which ascended from piles of commissary and depôts of quartermaster's stores, marked the line of his retreat, and wrote the nature of his defeat upon the skies. In the general conflagration which we could see for miles in different directions, they destroyed millions of dollars worth of property. And it is now that he announces to his government that he is performing "a strategic movement, and changing his base of operations from the White-house to the James river."

On the 28th, General Toombs attacked the enemy near the Nine Mile road, but the advantage was apparently slight, yet it contributed to the general confusion and dismay of the enemy.

General Stuart with his Cavalry was doing good service in the direction of the White-House—each day capturing and destroying property, and sending large bodies of prisoners to the rear.

General Hood received orders to advance at an early hour on Saturday morning; but on reaching the Grape-Vine bridge he was compelled to halt and wait until the bridge, which had been destroyed by the enemy, could be repaired.

BATTLE AT SAVAGE'S STATION.

On Sunday morning, 29th, fierce picket firing was heard in the direction of the out-posts of the army, at an early hour. About noon the fight began under General Magruder's command—the slaughter was dreadful and our victory complete—and burning stores and scattered arms and clothing in every direction, gave evident signs of an unexpected retreat.

“The Railroad Merrimac,” an ugly monster, moved down early in the morning and shelled the adjacent woods and fields, until the enemy fell back from the road. It was struck several times with heavy iron balls, but was uninjured. At this place also the destruction of property was immense.

Late in the evening the enemy was again overtaken; the rear of the retreating forces warmly engaged us, but night coming on we could not realize the advantage gained, as we were unable to follow it up.

During the day it had become apparent that McClellan had eluded us, and was in full retreat over a road which Gen. Huger had been intrusted to watch. The reason why he suffered the enemy to move undisturbed along the road leading under the protection of his gun-boats remains still a mystery to all. While many believed him guilty of criminal favoritism towards the enemy—which we do not believe—and, especially, as this was not the first time he had failed to come up with his men when ordered in to the fight.

BATTLE OF FRAZIER'S FARM.

Monday morning, June 30th, General Jackson crossed the Chickahominy in pursuit of the retreating foe. In the evening the advance came up with his rear at the bridge at White Oak Swamp, which they were defending with artillery. Scouts from the Texas Brigade were sent over and drove in their pickets. Their artillery was then turned upon our men, but sheltering behind a hill, no one was injured. But morning revealed the fact that we had directed our fire sufficiently well to kill several pickets before they retired. After dark the fire of their artillery was again turned upon the crossing, which they kept up until about midnight, when they withdrew, and our men commenced repairing the bridge, which, by sunrise the next morning was completed, and we crossed over, and had the pleasure of knowing that our powder had not been burnt in vain by our artillery the previous evening. For dead and wounded Yankees and artillery horses proved the fact that random shots are as deadly when they hit in the right place as any others.

Generals Longstreet, A. P. Hill, Huger and Magruder pressing down on the right by the way of the Charles City road, overtook the enemy late in the evening posted on Frazier's Farm, when a bloody struggle ensued, in which Generals Hill and Longstreet were the principal participants—the battle continuing long after dark with frightful fury; and, although the enemy had selected his ground and massed heavy bodies of men, yet again he had to yield before the conquering armies of the South.

BATTLE OF MALVERN HILL.

On Tuesday morning, July 1st, our men, after crossing the bridge, found the out-post of the enemy in strong positions and numbers, which made our movements necessarily slow. About one hundred prisoners and fifty wagons were captured during the morning. The first notice we had of the contiguity of the enemy in force was announced by an exploding shell in the midst of the 1st Texas, which killed and wounded some fifteen men. And it was followed by another, which caused about the same injury. The right wing was also in motion, and pressing upon the enemy, who, after the slaughter of the night before, were making haste from the bloody field.

We were now in the neighborhood of Malvern Hill, and discovering the situation of affairs, we were moved to the left, and soon were thrown forward to support a battery, which had been sent up to drive the enemy's guns and feel his position. But we were soon ordered to the timber in the rear. Here two men in Co. I. and one in Co. D, 4th Texas, were wounded.

At 4 P. M., the infantry in great force moved up and engaged with great vigor, and until 10 o'clock at night the earth, air and water were in commotion. From sixteen batteries by land, and their gun-boats by water, they beclouded the day and lit the night with a lurid glare. Add to this the light and noise of our own artillery which had been brought forward, and like an opposing volcano with a hundred craters, it gleamed and flashed streams and sheets of burning fire—while long lines of human forms cast their shadows upon the darkness in the back-ground, and each joined, with his fire-lock in hand, to contribute to the terror of the awful scene. One could easily imagine, while witnessing this bursting storm of human passion, that he was within one step of the council chamber of his Satanic Majesty, and that he had assembled all the furies from the far-off region of his empire, and let them loose upon this devoted spot in the Old Dominion. For both in sight and sound it was awfully terrible. For the outline of human forms, as seen by the light of burning powder through the smoky air, looked like ghosts in human shape, while the heavens were vocal with unearthly sounds from the passage of masses of iron and globes of lead. Death now held carnival over whole fields of living men. And his was the victory on both sides. McClellan was making his last exertions to save his army. And by this powerful effort, he succeeded in checking the triumphant march of our arms, until he had placed his broken and routed army beyond our reach—under the fire of his gun-boats—which, however, during the night, had been more destructive to his own men than ours. But this he never could have done, had not General Huger failed to check him by not taking possession of the ground before he arrived. The whole plan had been admirably executed from the time General Hood left Richmond, on the 12th inst., to reinforce Gen'l Jackson, at Staunton, down to the last day's conflict, except in this one instance. And we are sanguine in the belief, that had he done his part as well as others, the whole Yankee army would have been captured. But they have escaped, and the whole of this bloody chapter will have to be repeated on some other field.

McClellan having made his escape and reached the "base" of his future operations, he produced one of the most remarkable documents known in the history of this great revolution. For having been defeated in half a dozen battles, and forced to the necessity of applying the torch to hundreds of thousands of dollars in stores, the most valuable to his army, he speaks of it as change "contemplated," and as having been "accomplished with success," and, no doubt, he has made thousands of his admirers believe it.— And after his army, for a week, had been running as for dear life, and making good their flight over the distance of about thirty-five miles, having frequently, both by day and by night, to turn and fight, while thousands of his men were being slaughtered, and thousands more were captured, without gaining anything except another chance to run, he said to his soldiers, "your conduct ranks you among the celebrated armies of history." I think he had more truthfully expressed it, by saying, "you rank all the armies, both of ancient and modern times, for you can out run any soldiers in the known world; which you have proved on various occasions, from the days of Bull Run, till now."

PERSUIT TO WESTOVER, AND RETURN TO RICHMOND.

Wednesday morning, July 2d.—When the sun cleared away the darkness of the night, it was discovered that the Yankees had also cleared out. We withdrew from the field, and prepared our rations for further pursuit. At the same time, strong parties were scouring the fields and woods beyond, to find their position, or the trails by which they had made their exit. And on Friday, while we were marching down to the neighborhood of Westover—McClellan's new "base," he was at work with the following Fourth of July speech:

HEADQUARTERS, ARMY OF THE POTOMAC, }
CAMP NEAR HARRISON'S LANDING, July 4th, 1862. }

"Soldiers of the Army of the Potomac:—Your achievements for the past ten days, have illustrated the valor and endurance of the American soldier. Attacked by superior force, and without hopes of reinforcement, you have succeeded in changing your base of operations by a flank movement, always regarded as the most hazardous of military operations. You have saved all your guns except a few lost in battle, taking in turn, guns and colors from the enemy.

Upon your march, you have been assailed day after day with desperate fury, by men of the same race and nation, skillfully managed and led. Under every disadvantage of number, and necessity of position also, you have, in every conflict, beaten back your foe with enormous slaughter.

Your conduct ranks you among the celebrated armies of history. None will now question that each of you may always, with pride, say, "I belonged to the Army of the Potomac." You have reached this new base, complete in organization, and unimpaired in spirit. The enemy may, at any time, attack you, we are prepared to meet them. I have personally established your lines, let them come, and we will convert their repulse into a final defeat.

Your Government is strengthening you with the resources of a great people. On this, our National birth-day, we declare to our foes, who are rebels against the best interests of mankind, that this army shall enter the Capitol of the so-called "Confederacy"—that our National Constitution shall prevail, and that the Union, which no longer can insure internal peace and external security to each State, must, and shall be preserved, cost what it may, in time, treasure and blood."

GEORGE B. McCLELLAN.

Major-General, Commanding.

McClellan says "you have saved all your guns, except a few lost in battle." When General Lee counts his guns, we find that McClellan has a different idea as to what the word "few" means, to that which Southern people have. And of those which he says they "took in turn," our men know nothing. But we give you the address of

GENERAL LEE TO HIS SOLDIERS.

HEADQUARTERS IN THE FIELD, }
July 7th, 1862. }

GENERAL ORDERS, }
No. 75. }

"The General Commanding, profoundly grateful to the only Giver of all victory for the signal success with which He has blessed our arms, tenders his warmest thanks and congratulations to the army, by whom such splendid results have been achieved.

On Thursday, June 26th, the powerful and thoroughly equipped army of the enemy was entrenched in works of vast extent and most formidable in character, within sight of our Capitol.

To-day the remains of that confident and threatening host lie upon the banks of James river, thirty miles from Richmond, seeking to recover under the protection of his gunboats, from the effects of a series of disastrous defeats.

The battle beginning on the afternoon of the 26th June, above Mechanicsville, continued until the night of July 1st, with only such intervals as were necessary to pursue and overtake the flying foe. His strong entrenchments and obstinate resistance were overcome, and our army swept resistlessly down the north side of the Chickahominy, until it reached the rear of the enemy, and broke his communication with the York, capturing or causing the destruction of many valuable stores, and by the decisive battle of Friday, forcing the enemy from his line of powerful fortifications on the south-side of the Chickahominy, and driving him to a precipitate retreat. The victorious army pursued as rapidly as the obstructions placed by the enemy in their rear would permit—three times overtaking his flying columns, and as often driving him with slaughter from the field, leaving his numerous dead and wounded in our hands in every conflict.

The immediate fruits of our success are the relief of Richmond from a state of siege, the rout of the great army that so long menaced its safety, many thousand prisoners, including officers of high rank, the capture or destruction of stores to the value of millions, and the acquisition of thousands of arms and fifty-one pieces of superior artillery.

The service rendered to the country, in this short, but eventful period, can scarcely be estimated, and the General Commanding cannot adequately express his admiration of the courage, endurance and soldierly conduct of the officers and men engaged.

These brilliant results have cost us many brave men, but while we mourn the loss of our gallant dead, let us not forget that they died nobly in defence of their country's freedom and have linked their memory with an event that will live forever in the hearts of a grateful people.

Soldiers! your country will thank you for the heroic conduct you have displayed—conduct worthy of men engaged in a cause so just and sacred, and deserving a nation's gratitude and praise.

By command of General LEE.

[Signed,]

R. H. CHILTON,
A. A. General.

This address contrasts well with that of the infidel Yankee leader of Northern fanatics, whose crusade upon the South is as unholy and unjust as that of Northern Europe, which sacked the cities and deluged the Southern States in blood. They claimed that their cause was holy, and upon their banners was emblazoned the cross—which is the star of hope to a s'n cursed earth. And in their march they filled the earth with weeping. And so our enemies boast a superior religious morality, and demand a holier Bible and purer religion than was taught by Prophets and Apostles. And in their social compacts and moral creed, reject the institution of Abraham, and the teachings of the Son of God himself. Then the bombastic rant of self conceit in McClellan's Fourth of July address, is in perfect harmony with the large pretensions, high profession and extravagant pomposity of the people whose great leader and representative he is. But instead of that majestic air and omnipotent pomp with which McClellan addresses his army, General Lee begins, "Profoundly grateful to the only Giver of all victory," &c. How beautiful! how befitting a great General! bending before the Throne and acknowledging the supremacy of his God, while McClellan declares in his own name, "This army shall enter their Capitol," &c.

From the 5th to the 8th, the command was on picket duty; and in the afternoon of Tuesday evening we received orders to march, and took up the line towards Richmond, and on the tenth, pitched our tents on the same ground from which we had moved on the morning of May 31st, to march to the battle of Seven Pines.— Thus we completed a tour of five hundred miles, passing through several bloody engagements, and at the end of forty days, were right where we had started. But the chapter of incidents which occurred during the time, will long be remembered by the Brigade—who, way-worn and battle-begrimed, are heartily glad of another opportunity to rest. All through the camp they are seen stretched upon the ground under the shade of their "flies" and the surrounding trees, while some are gone into the City to look after wounded friends.

SAD REFLECTIONS.

After the engagement at Gaines' Farm, we came with the wounded to the City, to do all in our power for their comfort. And on learning the command had returned, we visited the camp, and will long remember the greetings we met from both officers and men.— But how sad were the hearts of those we met, could easily be discovered in the cloud which immediately chased from the face the smile of pleasure that lit the countenance at our meeting: Many, both officers and men, were absent from camp. Some of them were in the hospitals, while others were left to sleep on the battle field in the soldier's grave—they will no more attend the roll-call of their companions, command the men on parade, nor march to the music of the fife and drum—nor shall we any more meet them in the private walks of life even when this cruel war is over. They will not return with us when we take up our line of march for our homes in the far west. No, they will not go—they have already got their discharge, sealed in blood upon the altar of their country, but they have not gone to the flowery Prairies of Texas. And though friends may often look for them, and listen for their foot-fall upon the threshold, it will not be heard—sad thought.—But when we return, we will tell his father that he fell with his battle harness on—sword in hand, and his face to the foe, and died with “forward” on his lips. We will tell his sister that even in death his face was lit up with a living lustre, which had burned there since the day that Butler's order of New Orleans was first read on dress parade—when he swore his strong right arm should avenge a sister's wrongs. Yes, we will tell his mother where he fell, and where we buried him. We will tell her that we wrapped his blanket around him, covered him with his martial cloak, and buried him in a soldier's grave. And to that loved one whose image he wore, we will return this ring, and tell her he was a gal-lant boy.

THE HOSPITALS.

By visiting the hospitals throughout the city, which are from three to four miles to the extremes, we can see what we suffered during six day's battles. There had been no arrangements to quarter the men of different States separately, except in a few instances. And the inconvenience and consequent suffering, no one can describe. If you had two friends wounded in the same fight, you would be fortunate, if in the city, you found them within two miles of each other. And as it was our duty to look after the welfare of the whole regiment, over two hundred and fifty of whom had been wounded, no one can properly imagine the trouble and labor it required to look them up, enquire into their wants and relieve their necessities. And how often and warmly we felt to reproach the authorities of our State for thus neglecting the wants of men who had left their homes to do and die for her honor and her liberty, the reader will be left to imagine. What a shame upon our State pride. And when we remember how well they had done their part, and how high they had written the name of the Lone Star State above the honors of every other at Gaines' Farm, we felt that Texas was unworthy of such sons. For they, as will be seen by official report, stormed and took the strongest position in that living wall of fire and bayonets, which the enemy had thrown round the Confederate Capitol. They broke his ranks, and led the way to victory, crowding the road to death, as if it had been the high-way to festivity and mirth. And now when wounded and unable to care for themselves, they are found crowded together in unhealthy rooms, on miserable beds, and are without adequate attendants and nourishing food. They suffered much on account of the inadequate arrangements, and also from the inefficiency of Surgeons, and the neglect of hospital officers and nurses—some of whom, in the dignity of their official position, felt at liberty, not only to be cross to the sufferers, but to insult friends who were looking after the wounded, unless they complied with all the formalities and technicalities of "red tape" diplomacy, and that too, during "official hours."

THE LADIES OF RICHMOND.

We would do injustice to those at whose hands we received a thousand kindnesses, were we to close this part of our narrative without a word of praise for the Ladies of Richmond. Thereby we should do violence to our own feelings, and be guilty of ingratitude, for kindnesses gratuitously bestowed. For the kind relief, smiling with a thousand sympathies, which they not only sent, but brought and delivered with their own hands, will never be forgotten by our suffering men. Early in the morning, and often through the rain, they were seen gathering round the hospitals, each one laden with just such things as woman knows how to prepare, and none so well as a soldier with ghastly wounds and exhausted frame, hundreds of miles away from home and friends, knows how to appreciate. And through all the day long, they were seen hovering round these scenes of suffering, like convoys of ministering Angels on errands of love. And they would not only come and bring such things as make the sick man glad, but would see that his sheets and clothes were changed, and, with their own hands, make up his bed, smoothe his pillow, and often comb his hair, and bathe his feverish hands and face—then with their soups, meats, cakes and teas, appease his hunger, and revive his drooping spirits with well flavored wines and cordials, and then talk with him in words of sweetness, of his mother and home. This they continued until the shadows of evening admonished them that the days work was done, and on leaving, many were the sacred admonitions and cheerful encouragements given to look to the great Physician who has a balm for the soul and body too.

The attention of Mrs. Webb, Mrs. Davis and Mrs. Stevenson, will long be remembered by the friends of Captains Porter, Ryan and Owen, and Lieutenants Lambert and Reich. Their names will be often repeated by others also who have recovered and gone to their distant homes, where they will tell of the acts of benevolence bestowed by the hands of strangers, and that they wanted for nothing, that the sympathies of these and other ladies could imagine, would afford comfort to either body or mind.

Beyond the river too, we saw them gathering round the hospitals of Manchester, to do offices of mercy for suffering strangers on their couches of straw, and with liberal hands they supplied their wants as if they had been their brothers. They knew they had fallen while defending their homes and their honor from the brutal invasion of men, who, in their official orders, neither respected the altars of religion, nor the honors of woman, and this was quite enough.

The brigade remained in camp until the 8th of August, during which time, the number of recruits returning from the hospitals, increased it to within a fraction of the number on duty at the battle of June 27th.

During our stay at this place, the subject of making some permanent hospital arrangements for our sick and wounded had become so apparent that the officers determined to take action in the matter. The sufferings of our men were so great, in consequence of being scattered in almost every ward throughout the city, so that no systematic relief could be rendered by their friends, that they determined to erect a ward for the benefit of the 4th, provided I would superintend the building and furnishing of the same. And although this did not belong to the duties of my office, and would give me a great amount of labor and annoyance, in consequence of the unwillingness of the department to furnish the material necessary; and the great scarcity of such things as were needed, making it almost impossible to purchase, yet with the hope of having a place where our sick and wounded could be gathered and cared for after they had behaved so well in the defence of our country, I felt willing to do any thing in my power for their comfort. And in fifteen days after receiving the orders for its construction, it was ready with forty-six beds, and we began to receive the sufferers into it.

Each Sabbath while thus engaged in the city, we went to the camp to preach for the 4th and 1st, who were sufficiently near each other to assemble at the same place—either in the morning or evening, and at other hours of the day had service either with the 5th, or in the sick camp near by. Never had the men attended so well nor listened with so much interest. The terrors through which they had passed, had made their impressions deep, and we trust, lasting upon their minds. And from many private interviews, we learned that numbers of them had resolved to become soldiers of the cross, as well as soldiers of their country. The Testaments and tracts—as many as we could procure, were received and read with unusual interest. And to Rev. William Brown, D. D., and lady, we feel greatly indebted for aid in procuring religious matter for the soldiers to read.

And we cannot pass the Young Men's Christian Association, without the highest word of praise known to our language. From them we received the first word—which spoke out in action—of encouragement when trying to relieve the temporal wants of our men. They gave me clothes for them, when they had none, they gave me something for them to eat when they were sick and hungry. And we hope they will not be forgotten by our men in time to come, and that their thoughts will speak in actions too. They well deserve the name they bear.

The campaign thus far, had been a stirring one in all its details, from the Potomac, until the six day's battles around Richmond was ended. But the end is not yet. For by the time it was over, long lines of troops began their march towards CEDAR MOUNTAIN.

After the successful movement of the "Stonewall" to the rear of McClellan, General Jackson led his brave army back in the direction of the Valley. But instead of crossing the mountain, he moved up to the above named place, and opened another campaign, which proved to be as brilliant as either of the preceding ones.— On the 8th of August he began an engagement with the commander who dates his orders from, "Headquarters in the saddle—" "always looking at the backs of his enemy, never studying the base of operations, nor the line of retreat." But it would appear after the "Stonewall" had become a mountain avalanche, that he performed the task well for one never having "studied." For after losing two thousand five hundred men, if he did not turn his back upon the "rebels," he must have had a hard way and road to travel. For by the 30th of August he is found near Bull Run, and running again. Our loss amounted to about six or seven hundred. But not having "studied" the science of retreating, Pope halted to take another view on the Rappahannock, in a BATTLE AT FREEMAN'S FORD.

After resting and recruiting up until the 11th of August, our Division received orders to move. But the place of our destination was, as it ever had been, a mystery. We were to go north, but to what point, and how far, no one knew. Jackson and Longstreet had gone, and we were to join one or the other, but which, we did not know. At 1 o'clock, P. M., we took up the line, and marched thirteen miles, and on the next day, ten miles, and camped near Hanover Junction. The next day we moved to Anderson Station. Here we remained several days, and then passing near Orange Court House, we joined General Longstreet. The weather was oppressively warm, and several in the Division were smitten with sun-stroke, but as warmer times were just ahead, we moved forward to the Rappahannock. Arriving at Freeman's Ford on the 23d, we were ordered up to relieve General Trimble in the front. But on arriving, we found that the enemy had crossed in force in the immediate front of General Trimble. The preliminaries of the battle, as old soldiers could readily see, had already begun.—The artillery had been at work for some time, and now the sharpshooters were marking their objects, and ever and anon, you could see some prominent Yankee go down to bite the dust: Soon the skirmishers engage, and in a few moments, the fire flashes along the main line. On arriving, the Texas Brigade took position on General Trimble's right, and Colonel Law's Brigade on his left.—With line of battle thus formed, the "Forward" was given; the line of the enemy was instantly broken, and driven headlong into the river. And pouring a dreadful fire into their crowds of confused and broken lines, as they were huddling together to cross, many were shot in the back, and others drowned by the crushing crowd which pressed for the other shore. It was the work of but a few minutes, yet about three hundred of their killed and wounded were left upon the ground and in the river. Here Major M. D. Whaley, of the 5th, fell mortally wounded. His thigh was shattered by a shell, and had to be amputated. He died on the next day. We lost only ten men in the fight—all of the 5th Texas. (See the list in the appendix.)

It rained that evening and night, so that the wagons could not cross the stream. Green corn was the only chance for food; and from the same field we drew rations from one side, and the Yankees from the other. At night, on the 23d, the wagons came up; and while the men were cooking their beef and bread, they received orders to march immediately. Supper was in every imaginable shape and condition, except one—ready to eat. Some had just drawn, others were washing their frying-pans; some had their beef on the fire; others had only got their flour in the pan, and had their hands well bedaubed with the dough—in short, they had supper in such a shape that they could neither eat nor carry it along. And whether they said any bad words at such a disappointment; it is not my business to tell, nor yours to guess. Some objected and others complained, but it was no use; for the order had come for the wagons to go to the rear and the men to the front. They were near Waterloo, but it was not the Waterloo of history. And although we had suffered no defeat in arms, the boys wet, hungry, and with a long night's march ahead, did suffer a dreadful defeat in their supper. And when they found they had to go, they charged it to the account of profit and loss, and moved off. The next day they had another chance to mix up their dough, but they were not disappointed this time. On the evening of the 26th, they quit camp, marched all night, rested an hour in the morning, marched until noon and rested two hours—having crossed the Rappahannock—continued the rout through Salem until 10 P. M., and halted within four miles of Thoroughfare Gap.

PASSAGE OF THOROUGHFARE GAP.

The next morning (28th) it was found that the enemy had taken possession of the gap, and was ready to dispute the passage. Jackson had passed without molestation, they being unaware of his movements. But the news had gone out, and they were unwilling that another army of equal force should pass a gap where five hundred men could hold five thousand with but little exposure or danger. We had every prospect of a hard time at this place—a narrow defile, only sufficiently wide to admit a line of men in double files, with high mountains and long slopes on either hand, all occupied by the enemy, who were drawn up in line of battle to receive us. But disputed or undisputed, we were not to be checked long at this point. For Jackson had gone ahead, and every one knows that he cannot live long in the same country with the "blue jackets," without a fight; and for us to remain here and fool away our time with a few dirty Yankees, would leave him liable to be cut to pieces, or captured by the enemy in full force, who were near at hand. Gen. D. R. Jones was ordered forward; and on reaching the gap, immediately opened upon them, and pressing vigorously, drove them before him from the slopes and gap, and led his men to the other side. The whole line quickly following, passed through and bivouacked on the field beyond on the night of the 28th. All were aware that hot times were just ahead; for the booming of Old Stonewall's cannon was distinctly heard. We killed and captured about one hundred during the evening—but few casualties on our side.

ADVANCE TO MANASSAS.

When the morning of the 29th had scarcely dawned, the Texas

Brigade was thrown to the front; and a party of select riflemen of this brigade, under Lieut. Col. Upton, of the 5th Texas, constituted the advance guard. Moving forward, they came up with the rear guard of the enemy before sunrise. Pressing them vigorously, this gallant officer and his splendid marksmen drove in the rear of the enemy so rapidly, as to be frequently under the necessity of halting for the troops to come up. They did not move as if they were afraid to come in contact with the enemy. But following closely at their heels, they had frequent opportunities to try their marksmanship at the retreating guard. They also captured more prisoners during the morning than there were men in their own party. Early in the day they came up with the main body of the enemy on the plains of Manassas. They had driven them back about eight miles, and were now near the ground where Jackson's cannon was heard on yesterday evening. Forming upon line of battle as established by him, they rested and waited for orders.— Jackson had renewed the attack, and was now engaging them to our left; and from the thunder of artillery, and the roar of musketry, which came up from that direction, no one had to be told that the work of human slaughter was going on. Gen. Hood posted one of his brigades (Col. Law commanding) on the left of the Warrenton and Alexandria Pike, and the other (Texas) on the right. The line of battle, as established by Gen. Jackson, running nearly north and south, and facing to the east, crossed the Pike about one mile from Groveton—or three miles west of the Stone Bridge, across Bull Run, as it is better known in history—it being the one over which the enemy passed when attempting to flank our army last year. This line as now formed, was in sight of that classic ground. And the tide of battle is soon to roll its dreadful wave over the same field—to rage and break over the same hills—making the earth tremble under the charge of rushing squadrons, filling the air with its hideous roar, and the heavens with clouds of dust and mountains of smoke.

THE PRESENT AND PAST.

Thousands of living warriors stand trembling with eager anxiety upon the same ground, waiting for the word, to tread where fallen heroes sleep, and wrench from the hand of our enemy another palm for our country's glory. The position of the two armies is nearly the same as it was twelve months ago, only reversed; and it is now to be tested, whether or not we can whip them on either side of the field.

All the recollections of the past crowd upon the mind. Many of the heroes of July 21st are here. The 'Old Third Brigade,' now under the command of Col. Law, floats its colors proudly up, remembering the hard-earned honors of the past, and are resolving that their flag shall have "Manassas" inscribed upon it a second time. The 4th Alabama, which then stood like a giant in his strength, has again nerved itself for the combat. The names of Colonel Jones, Captain Lindsay, and Lieut. Turner among their first officers, and Landman, Arnold, Kees, Bradford, Preston, Bailey, Briggs, Pitts, and many others, who stood with them in the ranks, bled upon this very ground. The living now re-resolve to do their country honor, and avenge the death of their fallen friends. For their very blood crieth unto them from the ground, and they hear their voices amid the roar of fire-arms, calling upon them by all the sacred fidelity of bye-gone days, to defend their graves from the polluted tread of sacriligious hordes, and their country from dishonor and oppression.

This field presents one of the liveliest scenes in the grand drama of war which the world has ever beheld. We might here stand and gaze upon it in mute silence, as it stretches away towards the sunrise, until every hill and vale had told its story—each a history of itself—of the 21st of July, 1861. But living scenes of real life are more interesting. The roar of cannon, which now disturbs the ear, and the long black lines of moving armies, are more attractive. The chivalrous knights of antiquity, and the marshals of Napoléon, of half a century ago, may pass in review before the mind in times of peace, when the fife and drum are not heard upon the soil of the South, and when the thunder of artillery ceases to be heard over the grave at Mount Vernon. This is no place to tell what Cromwell did; nor describe the fields where the Cæsars fought. Neither does Yorktown, nor New Orleans have claims upon our time now—no time nor attention for the history of the past. To-day, we make history for the world to read. To-day and to morrow we will write more than one of its pages in human blood. On yesterday, the roar of battle and the purple stream begun.

SECOND DAY'S BATTLE.

To-day a broader and bloodier scene is opening up before us.— For now (4 o'clock P. M.) the enemy moves forward in tremendous force, both in number and effort, upon the lines of Jackson (on our left) from one end to the other; but he holds his ground, and piles them in scores as they come. A courier from Longstreet arrives with orders to Gen. Hood to lead his Division forward. But before they had time to come to order, the enemy having advanced under cover of the woods, opened fire. The order was instantly given, and the whole line moved down on both sides of the road into the open field. Their step is steady, and glistening steel flashes along the line. The artillery has been planted upon the hills; and as the infantry moved down, the artillery filled the heavens with shot and shell. Finally, the "make ready" is heard, and instantly a sheet of fire flashes along the line. The advancing line of the enemy falters, halts—another volley, and they give way, fall back, and take up another position to the rear; but only to be driven again and again, as our advancing lines draw near the ground upon which they assayed to stand. Thus, on and on they are driven, until night puts an end to our progress, and gives shelter to a vanquished army. But it was not until 9 o'clock at night the warriors were called off from the chase, and ordered to rest upon their arms.

After thus pressing and driving them a mile and a half, our officers supposing the enemy would withdraw to some little distance, to make arrangements for the morning, aimed to take advantage of all they had gained, by quietly moving up and taking position upon the abandoned ground. But they were mistaken; for they had gone but a short distance, when they found themselves in the midst of the enemy. It was so dark that one flag could not be distinguished from another; nor the Yankee troops from Southern soldiers; and our men had to resort to the bayonet, and butts of their guns to drive them back from the ground. And owing to some little confusion among our own regiments, they had to call out their names and numbers to prevent being fired into by each other. The enemy heard it, and took advantage of the information gained. One of their brigades, by our movement in the dark, had been cut off. But as they came up, they sung out, "5th Texas, don't shoot;" and so passed. At the same time, to divert our attention, they dashed a squadron of cavalry upon us, or else the trick might have been detected in time to have captured or shot them down upon the spot; for the 5th Texas was at hand, and the deception would not have lasted long enough for their purpose. But the cavalry paid well for their visit. Many of them slept upon the ground by their newly made acquaintances, and their slumber was so deep that the rising sun did not wake them up.—The order, "Right about," was quietly given, and our men fell back about two hundred yards. Pickets were then posted within about sixty paces of the enemy. One of our men went forward to look out the position and strength of the enemy. But he had not gone far when he received a shot, and crawled back to the line.

Colonel Law's command captured one piece of artillery during its brilliant march on the other side of the Pike. The Colonel had not only smelt powder on that field a year ago, but the battle scar which he then received, was to be avenged in the second fight.—General Hood was in charge, not only of his own Division, but received and sent forward three or four other Brigades.

It was now discovered that this Division was far in advance of Jackson's Corps; and at midnight, orders were sent round to fall back to the line from which the charge had begun. Here the weary warriors rested, and wait and wish for the coming morning.

THE SECOND GREAT VICTORY AT MANASSAS.

The morning of August 30th finally dawned. And the deeds of this day, will be read long after these warriors have ceased to hear the roar of battle. And as the reader would love to witness the struggle from morning till night, and watch the advance of our conquering arms to the farthest end of the field, we will take our stand on the heights where our line of battle was first formed; and to the left of Colonel Law's Brigade, which brings us near to Jackson's right; but a little to the rear of where he is now engaging the enemy. This position places us in the centre, Jackson's army on the left, and Longstreet on the right. It is true, that the position to which I have invited you, is one on which there are many Yankees posted, but you need not be afraid of them, for Jackson passing on Thursday, and Hood on Friday, located them there, and now they are as peaceful as you would have them be, except the stink of those left by Jackson. But as this is a common failing with the Yankees, to the smell of Southern people, you must put up with it for one day. And, as you are not accustomed to the music of shot and shell, nor the melody of grape and canister, it may make you a little nervous. But I will advise you of the fact, that you should not dodge, when you hear them pass, for in trying to get your head out of the way of one, you may put it right in the way of another. And while you are thus putting the head out of danger, you may get shot in the foot, and if you turn around to avoid a scar in the face, you may get shot in the back. Having taken our position, and facing to the east, we have the battle field of Manassas before us. The Warrenton and Alexandria Pike, passes two or three hundred yards to our right.—The field upon which the battle was fought last year, lies to the right of the Pike, which crosses the Run on the Stone Bridge, about three miles off, but which we cannot see, in consequence of a skirt of timber a little beyond Young's Branch; the position from which we fell back last night. To the right, and about a mile distant from the bridge, may be seen the position occupied by General Johnston, as he watched the movements of the enemy, and sent forward troops to Beauregard. The artillery has taken position upon all the surrounding heights.

Picket firing and artillery duelling, begins at an early hour in the morning, on different portions of the field. The enemy have followed up, and occupied the ground which we abandoned for want of support—and looking beyond Groveton, you can see the "red breechés Zouaves," and old United States Regulars, crossing Young's Branch, and taking position in the rear of Groveton.—Towards noon the enemy are seen in great force, the artillery they post on every hill, and form their infantry in the vallies and gorges below. The preliminaries having been arranged, heavy lines of skirmishers are thrown forward. The field begins to present to the eye a little world of commotion. Bayonets bristle, the long lines, and heavy masses are moving yonder and yonder, on both sides of the road. The hopes of Southern Liberty are in line of battle, and officers are standing in little groups, while aids and couriers are dashing from one position to another, receiving and conveying orders to the different commands. Clouds of smoke are rising from the hill-tops, and growing and blackning, as the number of guns is increased, and more vigourously served by the cannoniers. Conspicuous, and a little to our right and rear, is Riley's splendid batteries, throwing shot and shell into their midst. Yonder to our left, the skirmishers are hastily drawn in, and a sheet of fire blazes along the line on the Peach Grove Farm. It is 4 o'clock, P. M. A desperate effort is being made by the enemy to turn Jackson's right. But, having his position in the railroad cut, his men are but little exposed. And with good aim, they thin the ranks of the advancing line. At last, they reach the top of the hill, and are piled in scores upon the ground. Their lines waver and fall back, yet it is but to rally and renew the charge.—Another and another line moves up to their support; but they only meet the same deadly fire more murderous than before.—There is a rail fence between them, and their lines are not more than seventy paces from each other. That fence was literally shot to pieces, and many of the rails cut in two, and shot into splinters by rifle balls. Their lines were again driven back—and not to be rallied. But, giving way in great confusion, were pursued by brave men, who checked the speed of many a Yankee, as he made haste from the range of Jackson's riflemen. Listen, and you may hear the shout of victory from Jackson's little band of heroes, in pursuit of the flying foe. The surge of that mighty cheer, rises above the storm of battle.

But gazing so intently upon this part of the line we have lost sight of the field. Look yonder on the Pike, they have driven in the skirmishers, and the battle begins under Longstreet's command.

HOOD'S DIVISION IS MOVING, and, having crossed that open field, the Texas Brigade is entering the skirt of timber to the right. They are gone for but a few minutes, until the roar of a thousand muskets is heard, and the great iron balls break, and rend the forest like a storm. The bodies of the trees are scathed and severed, and the giant arms of the oak are broken like the reed. Soon the Texas Brigade is struggling like a giant, with the flower of the enemy's army; but in a few minutes the work is done, the ground is covered with the dead, and the hills with the flying foe. They charged gallantly on, with their usual daring and enthusiasm, driving them in great confusion, for a mile and a half. These were the Zouaves and Regulars, to which your attention has been called; and in testimony of the manner in which our boys disposed of them, we quote a few lines from Pollard's history of the battle: "Hood's Brigade formed Longstreet's left, and, of course, charged next the Pike. In its track, it met Sickles's 'Excelsior Brigade,' and almost annihilated it. The ground was piled with the slain." They had been selected and pitted against the Texans, as we have since been informed by prisoners captured. They had been feeling for our position for a day or two; and the collision of the evening before, had revealed to them the part of the field we were on. But, coming in sight of them, our men were not frightened at their red breeches, nor the appearance of their red scull-caps, with cow-tail looking tassels; but they seemed to be fired afresh for the combat. And I guess it will be some time before those Zouaves will hunt up the Texas boys again, to "skeer" them with their scarlet trowsers. This is the second time we have met and whipped them; but, if they are not satisfied, let them look us up again. At the far edge of this timber, they lay thick over the ground, and then scattered up and down Young's Branch, and far over the field beyond. The line of their flight was marked by the carcasses, which fell from their ranks as they were making a brave charge in the wrong direction. Hundreds of them, after our own men were buried, were hilled up like a potato-patch on the field. But many of their stinking carcasses lay for weeks polluting the air, and their bones now bleaching on the sun, on the very soil which their polluted feet had desecrated. So the number was small that was left to gloat over a victory, won from the soldiers of Texas. And they, instead of rejoicing in the glories of a victory, have to mourn the shame of a disgraceful defeat.

THE FOURTH CAPTURES A BATTERY.

Soon after the enemy had been driven from their first position, a courier arrives to inform General Hood, that General Longstreet wished to see him immediately. Ordering his command to "press the enemy" back to the branch, and there halt under shelter of the hill" from the battery, he rode back to receive the orders of the Commanding General. Although the officers and men of our brigade are usually strict in their obedience to orders, they did trespass, to some extent, on this occasion. And General Hood might have known better than give such orders, at such a time—for having been with the brigade as long as he has, he might have known, that with such a temptation before them, they could not obey it. They, however, did obey the first part of the order, "drive them back to the branch," to the letter, but the "halt" part of the order, they could not obey. For, with the red breeches "skedaddling" over the field, and that fine battery in full view, they marched right on, and in one bold dash, cleared the guns, and swept every thing from the field before them. It was here that Major Townsend fell wounded, while gallantly cheering his men to the charge. And, as if in defiance of the cannon, moved right up to its front, discharging his six shooter at the men that worked the guns, and fell within a few steps of its mouth.

When General Hood returned, they were not to be found where he had ordered them to halt, but passing up the hill, he found that they had run over the battery, and were in the valley beyond pouring their deadly fire into the backs of those splendid troops, which McClellan had eulogized so highly below Richmond, on the Fourth of July. Here they were moving in glorious confusion—Zouaves, Regulars and Artillerists, all together. When the General came up, instead of having them arrested for disobedience of orders, and sent to the guard house, he said, "boys you don't know how proud I am of you. You have behaved gallantly; you have done nobly. For you have fought like heroes. Men who fight in this way, can never be whipped."

The brigade was now far in advance of the other portions of the army—the 4th Texas leading the van. They had looked neither to the right nor to the left, to see if others were doing their duty, and coming up to their support, but with the red breeches before them, they had been pressing forward to the "mark." After driving them sufficiently on to gain a position of shelter from the fire of the enemy, the General, riding in front of the 18th Georgia, halted the command, that it might have time to rest, and moving on to the right near the Chinn House, took position upon an eminence, where he could watch and direct the movements of the line over that portion of the field. Some five or six brigades were there received, and posted by him, under the fire of the enemy's guns. Too much cannot be said, in honor of the gallant manner in which he had behaved and handled, not only his own Brigade and Division, but those also which were sent to him for disposition, while the fight was going on. He won for himself a name that will go down in history. For not only did he command his own men, viz: the 1st, 4th and 5th Texas, 18th Georgia and Hampton Legion, and rush them like a whirlwind, over the field—directing the destiny of the "Lone Star" to a higher position upon the roll of honor, but had immediate command of nearly all the troops on this portion of the ground.

While our Brigade was resting at the point where General Hood had halted it, General Evans rode up on his grey charger, and rallied himself for a moment, waving his hat and eulogizing the men. The boys, some of them, were foolish enough to think that he was lost from his command, but if he was, it was not long before he found them again, and led them on to the fight in his usual way.

As soon as the men had time to rest, and our advancing lines came up in supporting distance, our Brigade was again led forward. And others who had not participated in the fight, were brought forward and thrown upon the field, until the whole concentrated army of the enemy found itself flying in a second Bull Run defeat, across the same stream which they had crossed a year before in grand confusion, and hastening might and main towards Washington as for dear life. Or, in more modern language, they were "skedaddling at Bull Run speed," to effect a "splendid change of base." (?)

Gen. Longstreet was in the rear, sending forward the men as fast as they arrived, and watching the behavior of his corps as they strove successfully with superior forces. And I will take occasion here to remark that it seems that our commanding officers have at last learned to be prudent, and not unnecessarily expose themselves, and thereby their army and their country, to dangerous perils, by taking their position too near the enemy's fire. True, the highest in command, under certain circumstances, should lead the charge, and go with the men even to the cannon's very mouth. But this is not often. Our men do not need their chief officers to set them an example of bravery and daring. They only need to be told when and where to go.

At the battle of Gaines' Farm, Gen. Hood commanded the 4th Texas in person. This was a trying hour. He had already sent forward the other regiments of his command into the fight. This regiment had been held in reserve. The time had come and the place found in which it was most needed. He knew the men and they knew him; and each knew the confidence which the other had, in an hour of trial, and with a mutual confidence thus sustained, there was no fear of failure. The battle had been raging all the afternoon, and our advantages were but small, if indeed, they could be called advantages at all. Our lines had been held in check. Brigade after brigade had been led rapidly forward, and as rapidly repulsed; and some of them driven from the field. The fate of the day, which was almost at a close, now depended upon one single bold dash, that would break and penetrate the enemy's front, and throw his lines in confusion. We could afford to hazard the destiny of one of our best officers in the dreadful attempt. It was made and done. The shout of victory was first heard in the 4th Texas, under Hood's command. And we may here say, that no one doubted the bravery of Colonel Marshall, who fell just as the charge begun. Nor did they question the gallantry of their daring Major, Bradfute Warwick, who fell mortally wounded, soon after they had stormed and taken the first breast-works. But every one knows, that the presence of an officer high in command, nerves the men to almost super-human exertions in an hour like this.

And it was again necessary on the plains of Manassas that some one should stand forth upon the field, whose proud spirit and noble bearing would inspire each officer and man with the perfect assurance of victory. And for this high, though dangerous position, the General commanding again selects General Hood, who performed the duty assigned with great satisfaction, and filled the most sanguine expectations of all upon the field.

But in thus presenting the noble part which this officer acted on the Plains of Manassas, we would not detract from one of the gallant officers who were in command, nor from a single soldier the praise due to his valor. For the whole army, with the fewest exceptions, did their duty on this day. For the very thought of the presence of the spirits of fallen brothers, who bled on this field a year ago, and over whose graves we now tread, was sufficient to make each man a giant in the fight. And each one will be held in remembrance by a grateful country for the part which he so nobly acted. And even the scars received will not, like the mark on Cain, point them out as monsters to the world, but make them respected wherever they may go.

Thus the day ended, and so did the second battle of Manassas, after three days bloody conflict, and with as much honor to our arms as on last year. And August 30th, 1862, will be written by the historian with as much pride to our country as July 21st, 1861.

Jackson's victory on the north side of the Pike was quite as complete as our own, and our victorious army slept beyond the battle-field, near the Sudley Ford road.

The brave and gallant Upton, Lieut. Colonel of the 5th, was left dead upon the field. He did his duty on both days of the fight.— His loss is deeply felt. Lieut. Colonel Ruff and Major Griffis, of the 18th Georgia, were wounded. Col. Robertson, of the 5th Texas, was also severely wounded, while leading his regiment far out upon the field.

Col. Wofford, of the 18th Georgia, Lieut. Col. Work, 1st Texas, and Lieut. Col. Garey, of the Hampton Legion, being in command of their respective regiments, deserve the highest praise for their coolness and bravery. Lieut. Col. Carter, in command of the 4th Texas, had an opportunity to show his value as an officer upon the field; and to his gallantry may be attributed, in a great degree, the brilliant dash made upon the battery of six guns, five of which were captured by his regiment. And we would again call to mind the conduct of Major Townsend, whose bravery amounted almost to recklessness at the time the charge was made upon these guns; and being wounded, the regiment lost his services during the remainder of the day. Capt. Hunter, while leading his company forward upon the same battery, received a serious wound, which, although dangerous, was not mortal. But those who were not wounded deserve equal praise with those who were more unfortunate. Among whom were Captains Winkler, Cunningham, Bassett, Martin, Darden, Brandon, Barziza, (who received a slight wound in the arm,) and also Lieut. McLaurin and Dugan, who were in command of their respective companies. I would love to give the names of all the subordinate officers and privates who fought so gallantry. But the limits of the present work will not allow me that pleasure. But as the conduct of our whole brigade, as well as that of Col. Law's Brigade, is better described by Gen. Hood, under whose eye they fought, I content myself by giving it in his own language; and this short sentence says all that good officers and brave men could ask. After speaking of the trophies which they won upon the field, he adds, "As to their gallantry and unflinching courage, they stand unsurpassed in the history of the world."

The trophies won are justly distributed among the regiments as follows: Hampton Legion, three stands of colors; 18th Georgia, two; 5th Texas, four; and the 4th Texas, two, and five pieces of artillery. This battery, commanded by Capt. Curran, had volunteered under a call on that morning to support the Zouaves and Regulars, in their attack on the Texas Brigade. The commander of which remarked to one of our men, while he lay mortally wounded, "I promised to drive you back or die by my guns, and I have kept my word." And so he had, for when the men returned from the charge, he lay dead under one of his guns. This officer had a heart and a courage worthy of a better cause. Colonel Law's Brigade captured one gun and three stands of colors, making in all six guns and fourteen stands of colors, captured by Hood's Division.

But it becomes my painful duty, after recording the history of these regiments, and the glory of our arms upon this day, also to open to the reader the

CHAPTER OF OUR MISFORTUNE.

Yes, we must be sad in the midst of joy. For after we have scattered and driven the enemy in broken masses over the hills and beyond the stream, we must look back over ground which was marked by blood and fire at every step. Many of our officers, who were never absent from their post, and men that were never known to flinch from the fight, are not to be seen. The roll is called, and the "marks" run up, and it is found that one-half of our men are gone. They are left upon the field, scattered from this spot to the place where the fight begun—a distance of more than two miles. Some are dead and others are bleeding. And to form an idea of this horrible day, you have but to imagine a field over which the sword has flashed, and fifty thousand bayonets have bristled the hills from morning till night, and as many rifles poured their volleys of lead, while a perfect storm of iron hail rained all over the ground. Its extent from north to south is about three miles, by two in width. This done, and you have the field over which death rode in his chariots of fire, and held his conquering reign August 28th, 29th and 30th, 1862.

Our entire loss is supposed to amount to about six thousand, in killed and wounded; but the loss of the enemy is astonishingly greater—thirty thousand at least in killed, wounded and prisoners. Of this we have the means of positively knowing; for we were left in entire possession of the field, and, consequently, of the killed and wounded on both sides.

On the next day, after the killed and wounded had been cared for, the march was continued to the Sudley Ford, and from thence to the Leesburg Pike, three miles from Germantown. Here Gen. A. P. Hill, on Monday, completed the work of a battle which I may say begun at a distance of fifty miles from this place, and lasted for twenty days—for from August 9th to Sept. 1st, the work went on: Here we remained until next evening—the object being to cut off the enemy's trains and harrass his rear; but their good speed enabled them to save the greater portion. Yet the whole line was strewn with abandoned guns, caissons, wagons, ambulances, commissary and quartermaster's stores, ordinance of every kind, and small arms of every pattern—knapsacks, cartridge-boxes, canteens, haversacks, blankets, overcoats, camp-kettles, tin cups, and frying pans at almost every step in their splendid race from Groveton to the Stone Bridge, and for miles beyond.

MARYLAND CAMPAIGN.

After reaching Drainsville, we found we had accomplished about all we could expect in that direction. But there was another field for operation, and a part of the army was already wending its way in that direction. So we were faced about, and passing through and beyond Leesburg about four miles, we came to White's Ford, and crossed the Potomac into Maryland.

Sept. 6th.—Passing through Buckeystown, we arrived at the Monocacy river, at the crossing of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad. Here also is the junction of the Frederick road. The command was halted here for two days; for we were now in supporting distance of Jackson, who had gone above for the purpose of falling upon Harper's Ferry. And to prevent McClellan from reinforcing the enemy at that place, and also from moving upon Jackson's rear, we had been sent forward to occupy this line. While here, the boys amused themselves in blowing up the splendid Railroad bridge across the river, which must have cost thousands of dollars. From thence we moved through Frederick city, Boonsboro, and on to the vicinity of Hagerstown.

ENGAGEMENT AT BOONSBORO GAP.

On the morning of the 14th, we moved back to Boonsboro Gap, or South Mountain, a distance of thirteen miles. Arriving between 3 and 4, P. M., we found that General D. H. Hill had already begun the engagement, with a heavy body of the enemy, who were aiming to reinforce Miles at the Ferry. General Hood took up his position on the left of the Pike, but was soon ordered to move to the right, as the troops on that part of the field were giving way to superior numbers. On his march to the right, he met General Drayton coming out, saying the enemy had succeeded in passing to his rear. At this information, Hood immediately inclined his command still farther to the right, over a rugged country, and hastily put his men in position to receive them. Soon he ordered the two Brigades forward with fixed bayonets. The order was promptly obeyed, and our lines restored upon the ground, which had been lost. Night coming on, prevented farther pursuit. We lost but very few; yet had foiled the enemy in his effort with seventy-five thousand men, to relieve Miles at Harper's Ferry.

SHARPSBURG.

Soon after night, orders were received to withdraw from his position. All our forces were to fall back in the direction of Sharpsburg, or Antietam river; and we were again to act as the rear guard of the army. But there was little or no annoyance on the march. Arriving on the heights beyond the Antietam river, near the Town of Sharpsburg, about noon on the 15th, we took position on the right of the road leading to Boonsboro. But, as it was found that the enemy was threatening an immediate attack on the other flank, we were ordered to move to the extreme left, and take position on the Hagerstown road, near St. Mumma Church.— Here we remained, under the shot and shell of the enemy, until near sunset, on the evening of the 16th, at which time the enemy made a vigorous attack upon our left. They had crossed in great force higher up the Antietam, at Smoketown. Hood's Division, of two small Brigades, were all the troops in this portion of the field. Yet he succeeded in checking, and then in driving them back for some distance, when night put an end to the contest.— During the night, General Jackson's troops having arrived, they were thrown to our left, and at almost a right angle with our line, and with a space of some little distance between our left, and his right; his line facing west, and ours north.

The officers and men of this Division, having been without food for three days, except half rations of beef and green corn, General Lawton, with two Brigades, was ordered to relieve us, that we might have a chance to cook. On the morning of the 17th, the firing commenced at 3 o'clock, along the line of General Lawton. At 6, A. M., General Hood received notice from him, that he would need all the aid he could render, in order to hold the position. In a few minutes, another courier arrived, and informed him that General Lawton was wounded, and he must come forward immediately and take the command. His men were ready for the word, and were instantly moved out upon the field, where they met the advancing lines of an immense force, consisting of not less than two entire Corps of their army; and according to their own statements, were soon reinforced by several Brigades.

"Here," says General Hood, "I witnessed the most terrible clash of arms, by far, that has occurred during the war." A little world of artillery was turned loose upon us—and the line of their shot and shell screaming, blazing and bursting as they flew, made a perfect net work in their passage through the air. "And here," says he, "the two little giant Brigades of my command, wrestled with the mighty force, and although they lost hundreds of their officers and men, they drove them from their position, and forced them to abandon their guns on our left."

Thus the battle raged furiously until 9 o'clock. The enemy had been driven some four or five hundred yards by this little band of gallant men. But, fighting at right angles, with our general line of battle, it afforded the enemy an opportunity to pour a heavy fire into the right and rear of Colonel Law's Brigade, which made it necessary for the Division to move to the left and rear, into the woods, to close up the unoccupied space, between our left and Jackson's right, at the angle of the two lines, near the St. Mumma Church. And especially was this move necessary, as Jackson had moved the troops from his right flank, without our knowledge, thereby leaving our left entirely exposed. Moving back near the Church, they formed and held their position bravely until 10.30, A.M., when General McLaws arrived with his command, which, being formed, was immediately thrown forward upon the field, and becoming engaged, Hood's Division was withdrawn to the rear, to replenish their cartridge boxes. At noon they returned, and were ordered to form in rear of the Church, and hold their ground, which they did, until about 4, P. M., when the Division moved to the right, near the centre, and there remained until the night of the 18th. During the day, we waited their advance, but they did not move. Two or three guns were fired, as a challenge to the contest, but still they did not come.— They had received a shock, so severe, and lost so many officers and men, that they were not willing to hazard another attempt.— And they felt so proud that they had not been run entirely off the field as usual, they were perfectly willing to make the child's bargain with us—"I'll let you alone, if you'll let me alone." They knew from their facility at lying, that they could manufacture a splendid victory out of the fight, and not fire another gun, notwithstanding we had waited all day, and challenged them to renew the fight. And, sure enough, they have so published it to the world. But it is like those splendid victories won by McClellan, around Richmond—and by Pope, at Manassas.

HOOD SENDS FOR AID.

On the morning of the 17th, Major Blanton was despatched to General D. H. Hill, to ask for troops to assist in holding the left of our position, but he returned a negative reply—"He had no troops to spare." Again and again, General Hood sent for aid, while his little devoted band of heroes were struggling with the many thousands of the enemy, who were pouring in, in a constant flood. In hopes of aid, they held their ground, and even drove them back over the field, long after every prospect to the eye of the observer of their final success had fled. They were frequently cheered with the indefinite promise, "You will be reinforced soon, hold on a little longer." They had never been beaten upon the field, and knew not how to give up the ground. They were out-numbered, twenty to one. But there they stood, amid the storm of death, until they became the astonishment and admiration of their enemies. And in their report of the fight, they pay this Division, the following well earned tribute of praise :

FROM THE NEW YORK "HERALD," SEPT. 20TH.

"General Ricketts at once assumed command. But our victorious movement had lost its impulse. Our right had advanced and swept across the field so far, that its front, originally, almost in a line with the front of the centre and left, formed almost a right angle with them. While our lines rather faltered, the rebels made a sudden and impulsive onset, and drove our gallant fellows back over a part of the hard won field. What we had won, however, was not to be relinquished without a desperate struggle. And here, up the hills and down through woods and standing corn, over the plowed land and the clover, the line of fire swept to and fro, as one side or the other gained a temporary advantage. * * It is beyond all wonder, how men, such as these rebel troops are—can fight as they do. That those ragged and filthy wretches, sick, hungry, and, in all ways miserable, should prove such heroes in the fight, is past explanation. Men never fought better. There was one regiment that stood up before the fire of two or three of our long range batteries, and two regiments of infantry. And though the air was vocal with the whistle of bullets and the scream of shells, there they stood, and delivered their fire in perfect order."

As to the regiments here referred to, it will detract nothing from the honor of our troops, to tell the reader that this was our whole Brigade. Numbering in all, when this fight begun, only eight hundred and fifty-four men. Not the number of one full regiment. They had passed through so many battles, that regiments looked like companies, and brigades looked like regiments. Yet, small as they were, they did the work of strong, full commands.

The great misfortune on that day was, that our higher officers did not discover in time, that it was on this part of the field, that the enemy had staked the fortunes of the day. Of this, they could not be convinced, though frequently advised by General Hood and Staff, that they were moving in sight, and in tremendous force. And in connection with this matter, General Hood remarked, that he was "thoroughly of the opinion, that the victory of that day, would have been as thorough, quick and complete, as on the Plains of Manassas, on the 30th of August, if General McClaws had reached the field with his men, even as late as 9 o'clock."—The reasons for his tardiness, we hope, will be satisfactory, when he renders his report. But, if he moved carelessly up, stopping at the river and loosing two hours, as we are told he did, waiting for his men to strip and roll up their clothes, to prevent getting them wet, and then halting for some time, for them to make their toilette on the other side, not only the loud condemnation of a country, which had, in part, entrusted him with its destiny, should fall upon him, but the strong arm of the law should take hold, and by one way or another, remove him from a position, in which he is able to jeopardize her future weal. This is not the first time that a single man has thwarted the plans of a great army, and made its victory only half complete.

EVACUATION OF MARYLAND.

On the evening of the 18th, we received orders to recross the Potomac. Our march to and across the river was undisturbed.—This, of itself, will show to the world the nature of McClellan's victory. And if he had beaten and driven us, as he publishes, why did he allow us to pass quietly away, after holding the field a whole day and night? Why did he not follow our army as we did his, near Richmond, forcing him to turn and fight, to save his routed men?

We had accomplished our object, as far as we were able, and, of course, were ready to return. Harper's Ferry had fallen, and its rich prizes were ours. They, it is true, expected us to move against Washington, Philadelphia and Baltimore; and whether we would capture one or all of them, they could not tell. But we had started out for Harper's Ferry, and as much else as circumstances would allow us to accomplish. And having won it, we saw that the magnitude of further invasion was greater than our preparations, and we returned to await another "on to Richmond." Our loss will not exceed seven thousand men, in killed, wounded and missing, while McClellan's friends set down his killed and wounded at fourteen thousand seven hundred and ninety-six, up to the 18th. And, by adding about two thousand for the number that were slaughtered and drowned, in attempting to follow us across the river, and thirteen thousand killed and captured by Jackson on the 14th and 15th instants, you can see whether our Maryland campaign was a failure or not. The sum total of their loss in men, is twenty-nine thousand seven hundred and ninety-six; and in property we captured seventy-three pieces of artillery, fourteen thousand muskets, great quantities of ammunition of every kind, and finest quality, with quartermaster's and medicine stores to the amount of thousands of dollars, and two hundred wagons, with fine teams, all in harness made by Yankee labor, with which to haul the other property away. And so ends the brilliant campaign of twelve days across the Potomac.

It is due to the memory of those who fell, either killed or wounded, that their names be written and preserved for the pen of the historian, who will write them with other fallen sons of the South, and that Texas may see that her brave men were at their post when her honor and her liberty called for a sacrifice of blood. We have given them a place. (See appendix.)

HOSPITAL ARRANGEMENTS.

Having been left at Richmond to build and furnish a Hospital Ward for the sick and wounded of our regiment, it was not my pleasure to participate in the trials and marches of this brilliant campaign. It was expected that the wounded especially would be sent to me there ; but ascertaining that orders had been issued after the battle of Manassas Plains, by the Surgeon General, that the wounded should be stopped at Warrenton, Gordonsville and Charlottesville, we immediately set out for those places ; but on visiting the two last named places, and finding but few, and they well cared for, we continued on to Warrenton, where we found quite a number of each of the Texas Regiments. They had been quartered by Dr. Fennell, immediately after the battle, and were as pleasantly situated as circumstances would permit. For the number of wounded was so great, that their wants extended beyond the capacity of the town. After being with them five days, and doing for them as much as we could, the Doctor and myself left to take on which we had won two great victories, and had so many of our men killed and wounded. A train of ambulances was going down to gather up a few of the wounded, who had been left at private houses, and so we had the pleasure of a ride to the field. When we reached the place where the line of battle had been formed, we left the ambulance and begun our walk, following the line over which our Brigade had fought on both days of the battle. There were a thousand objects of interest yet to be seen. We could easily see where the two armies had met, and track them by the marks of shot upon the trees, and the graves upon the ground.— There were yet many bodies of the fallen enemy unburied, and the hands and feet and heads of others were exposed. The air was foul upon the field, and for a great distance around. You could mark the spots where the batteries had stood, by dead horses and the graves of men. From the discharge of the guns the grass had been fired and burned over the ground. On that portion where our gallant boys had met the Zouaves, the dead lay thick, and especially on that portion where the 5th Texas fought. And passing on to an eminence in the field, my attention was arrested by two boards standing at the head of one grave. And on approaching it, I read on one Niles Fossett, and on the other James Thomas. Brave boys—they belonged to the same company, were from the same town, had marched hundreds of miles, and fought through several battles together, fallen side by side before the same gun, died upon the same spot, and now sleep in the same grave. We passed on and around, and at last came back to the Peach Grove Farm, where Jackson had left the enemy in swaths upon the ground. But the declining sun admonished us to be going, or else we could not reach the house of Mrs. Hunton—that good woman under whose care Major Townsend and Captain Hunter were being healed. On the next day we returned to Warrenton, and there learned that a part (four) of the ambulances that had gone down with us had been captured. And we also learned, that while we were leisurely walking over the field, and interesting ourselves with all the broken relics, of that blood-stained ground, that the “sinners” were on both sides, and, at one time, within a few hundred yards of us. It was too late then to become frightened; but I must confess that it did even at that time make me feel a little wild, and, especially so, when I remembered that I had no arms of defence, that was much better than a goose-quill tooth-pick.

Soon after reaching the village, I heard that General Longstreet had had another engagement; and I felt certain that if he had, our Brigade had borne their part, and so I immediately determined to go on in that direction, and look after the condition of the wounded. During the evening I made every effort to procure conveyance, but was unsuccessful. The next morning a man promised to take me on; and about 10, A. M., I left for Winchester. But we had gone but a short distance, when the Yankee news from ahead became so thick and strong, that he, after telling me how much he thought of me, told me he would go my way no farther, and set me afoot. That evening I made eighteen miles, and the next day, Sunday as it was, I made twenty-five miles, which brought me to Winchester a little before sunset. I had narrowly escaped the enemy's stealing party a second time. For by the time I reached the town; they had possession of Paris in my rear—a little village at the gap in the Blue Ridge, which I had passed in the day. They made a dash at our cavalry that were stationed there, and frightened them off, and captured their baggage. But it would have made but little difference if they had captured the men too, for they were no account, or they would not have been surprised in this manner.

When I got within half a mile of Winchester, I met about fifteen of our men returning, wounded, from Maryland. This was the first direct word received of their fight; and I believe both parties were glad to see each other. I directed them to camp, some where near, as they were looking for a place where they could have their wounds dressed, get something to eat, and have a place to lie down. Stopping at a private house until morning, I went to the surgeon of the post, and he had the door of the basement of the M. E. Church, South, opened for me. Going to work, I had it arranged as soon as possible, and here received our men of all the Texas Regiments as they came. It was not long before the news reached the other hospitals and sick camps in the neighborhood.— And at the end of the 6th day, we had a hundred and ninety-four of our Brigade. True, about twenty of this number were not of the Texas Regiments, but they were of the 18th Georgia, who were in our Brigade, and having been so pleasant in the camp, and behaved so gallantly in the fight, and, in fact, sometimes calling themselves the 3d Texas, they felt like our own boys, and we took them in. And if there had been room, I should have taken the wounded of the Hampton Legion, another gallant regiment from the Palmetto State, who are also in our Brigade. For they have ever behaved like true sons of the South, when fighting was to be done. Brave as Spartans and true as steel, they are winning honors for South Carolina.

I need not say how glad the men were, with the prospect of attention. It was with great difficulty that we were able to procure the necessary appliances. For there were so many coming in to be accommodated.

VISIT TO THE CAMP.

On the 26th inst., learning that the army had moved back to within six miles of the town, I went out and had the pleasure of seeing those of my old regiment, that were left, after marching several hundred miles, and passing through the fire of six days, in battle. The men looked worn and tired. Their clothes were ragged, and many of their feet were bare; and in their coats, pants and hats could be seen many marks of the bullet. They had many times performed long marches, and fought hard battles, without ra-vions. The weather was warm and dry, and the dust had settled thick over their clothes. But they were cheerful and lively, and as resolved to fight to the bitter end as when wading the swamps of Louisiana, to get to Virginia. After such an arduous campaign, I expected to see them worn down and somewhat discouraged; but in this I was agreeably disappointed. They had marched long and fought hard—they had buried many comrades on different fields; but that same unconquerable spirit, gleaming through every feature of the face, and speaking in every act they performed, stood forth as defiant as when the first blast of the bugle was heard.—They had believed that “a people could never be conquered who were determined to be free,” and they believe so yet.

REVIEW.

October 7th and 8th, I was again in the camp, and Gen'l's Longstreet and Hood were reviewing the troops. On the 8th, as I sat looking on, while one regiment after another passed in review, (eighteen in all,) I saw one flag, in which were many holes, made by the bullets of the enemy. I watched it until it had gone some distance past. For it was a matter of great interest to me, to see an object upon which the history of the recent battles was so plainly and truthfully written. From the manly step of the Ensign, one could easily see that he was proud of his colors. It was a “Lone Star” flag, and belonged to the 5th, and, after the parade, I learned that it had been pierced forty-seven times, and seven ensigns had fallen under it. By the time I turned from looking after it, another was passing me. I knew it. It was an old acquaintance. Many times had I seen it on dress-parade, but never with such mingled feelings of pride and sorrow. It called to mind all the hardships and sufferings, fire and blood through which we had passed. It was made and presented by Miss Loola Wigfall to Col. Hood, for the 4th, with the motto which was graven on the spear-head. Nine Ensigns had fallen under it on the field. It had gone through eight battles, which in all had occupied eleven days, and brought off the battle scars of sixty-five balls and shot, besides the marks of three shells. It was the only flag to be seen, that had gone through so many battles, and had so many marks of honor. It was understood that this was the last time it would appear upon parade. For it is an object of too much pride to the Regiment, and honor to the State of Texas, to be kept in the camp. On to-morrow, it is to be committed to the care of Captain Darden, to be sent home to report our conduct in the hour of our country's struggles, and be deposited among the archives of the State. And knowing that hundreds would desire to see it, I had a drawing made, and here present it to our friends and relatives at home, that they may see the battle-flag, around which the 4th rallied in so many struggles for our country's liberty—and beneath which so many of our brave men have fallen. It is with great pride that we can send it home without a single stain; and to it the men of the 4th can point for the record of their deeds as long as Texas exists an independent and sovereign State. Beneath the flag I have written the name of our first Ensign, who carried it through the fire of Eltham's Landing, Seven Pines, Gaines' Farm, Freeman's Ford, and fell wounded on the second day on the Plains of Manassas, but is fast recovering, and will soon take his place again under the new flag.

“Fear not, for I am with thee. Say to the North give up, and to the South, keep not back,”

And that the reader may the better understand our appreciation of it, we here spread before him the letter of Lieut. Colonel B. F. Carter, which accompanied the flag when it was sent home to the Governor of Texas.

HEADQUARTERS 4TH TEXAS REGIMENT,
NEAR WINCHESTER, VA., Oct. 7th, 1862.

To his Excellency, F. R. TUBBOCK,
Governor of Texas.

SIR: I have the honor to present to you, by the hand of Captain S. H. Darden, the battle-flag of the 4th Texas Regiment, borne by them in the battles of Eltham's Landing, Seven Pines, Gaines' Farm, Malvern Hill, Freeman's Ford, Manassas Plains, Boonsboro Gap and Sharpsburg. From its torn and tattered condition, it can no longer be used; and it is returned to you, that it may be preserved among the archives of the State, as a testimonial of the gallantry of her sons, who have fought beneath its folds. I need not dwell upon the services of my Regiment. Its deeds in battle will go into the history of our country, and speak for themselves. And this silent witness bears eloquent evidence, that the men who followed it in action, were where shot fell thick, and death was in the air.

You will readily believe, Governor, that we part from the old flag with painful feelings. More than five hundred of our comrades in arms have fallen beneath its folds. And it is to us an emblem of constancy under multiplied hardships, gallant and dauntless courage in the storm of battle, and devotion unto death to our cause. Let it be preserved sacredly, that the remnant of our little band may, in future days, gaze upon its battle-stained colors, recall to mind the sufferings they have endured in their country's cause, and their children incited to renewed vigilance, in the preservation of those liberties for which we are contending.

Our General has presented us with another "battle-flag," and we hope to be able to acquit ourselves as well with that, as we have done with the old one.

Respectfully your serv't,

B. F. CARTER,

Lieut. Col. Commanding.

Our regiment numbered about one thousand men when we first entered the service, and last spring we were recruited by about five hundred more; and we now number one hundred and seventy-six for duty—who were on parade this evening. But it will not be understood that the balance have all been killed, or have died; but many of them are scattered over Richmond, in the hospitals, and along the road, to this place.

The First, carried its old flag through every battle, until at Sharpsburg, when the Ensign was shot down, unobserved in the corn field, as the regiment was changing its position to prevent being flanked, and it fell into the hands of the enemy, who, we learn from some of our men that were made prisoners, rejoiced over it exceedingly—mounting it upon a music wagon, and running up the Stars and Stripes over it, drove it through the camp, to the tune of "Yankee Doodle," and then to McClellan's headquarters, when they delivered themselves of several "Spread Eagle" speeches on the subject of capturing a Texas flag. Well, let them make the most of it, for it is the first Texas flag they have got, and I guess many of them will bite the dust before they get another.

The regiments are small, but recruiting from the hospitals in the rear every day, and I suppose they are quite as full now, as when they fought at Sharpsburg.

The loss sustained by this Division, (of two Brigades,) since leaving Richmond, October 11th, is two hundred and fifty-three killed on the field, sixteen hundred and twenty-one wounded, and one hundred missing—making in all, one thousand nine hundred and seventy-four.

In closing this part of the campaign, I present you with the General's address.

HEADQUARTERS—DIVISION,
NEAR WINCHESTER, Sept. 28th, 1862. }

GENERAL ORDERS, }
No. — }

The Brigadier-General, Commanding, takes much pleasure in tendering his thanks and congratulations to the officers and men under his command, for their arduous services and gallant conduct during the recent campaign. After having distinguished yourselves at the battle of Gaines' Farm, June 27th; your long and continued and tiresome march since leaving Richmond—dashing courage at the battle of Manassas Plains, August 30th, your truly veteran conduct at the battle of Sharpsburg, Md., September 17th, has won for you the merited praise and gratitude of the army and our country.

In less than three months, you have marched several hundred miles under trying circumstances, participated in several battles, and made yourselves the acknowledged heroes of three of the hardest fought battles that have occurred in the present war.

In none of these, have you elicited so much praise from our Commanding Generals, or so justly entitled yourselves to the proud distinction, of being the best soldiers in the army, as at the battle of Sharpsburg. Called upon to retake ground, lost to our arms, you not only did so, but promptly drove the enemy twenty-times your number, from his guns, and, if supported, would have led on to one of the most signal victories known to the history of any people. Your failure to do so, was attributable to others. And it was here, by your conduct in rallying and presenting front to the advancing columns of the enemy, that you earned higher praise than in any of the brilliant charges you have made. No achievement so marks the true soldier, as coolness under such circumstances as surrounded you on that memorable day. And it is with peculiar pride, the Brigadier-General Commanding, acknowledges, that, such of his command as had not fallen in that terrible clash of arms, were in ranks again, ready and willing to meet the foe.

By order of

J. B. HOOD,

Brigadier-General, Commanding.

McCLELLAN ATTEMPTS ANOTHER "ON TO RICHMOND."

McClellan, after the battle of Sharpsburg, was ordered to follow our army across the Potomac. He made an attempt, but the shock he received at the river, was so great, that he turned aside from the direct road, to look out an easier way than following in our rear. He, however, kept up appearances, as if he intended to drive us in full chase through Winchester, or capture Lee and his "rebels" before they could get out of the Valley. After making all his arrangements, and taking possession of all the Gaps in the mountains, to prevent our troops from interrupting his newly conceived plans, he made a dash for Gordonsville, but on arriving at Warrenton, to his astonishment, the "rebels" were all at Culpepper Court House, ready to receive him. Lee's eye was upon him. We had left Winchester on Wednesday morning, October 29th, and camped that night near Front Royal. The next morning we waded one branch of the Shenandoah, and passed through the Village at an early hour. After a hard days march, we camped on the mountain, near Gaines' Cross Roads. Friday morning the wagons and artillery separated from the troops, and took the road by New Washington Turnpike—the troops marching by the nearer dirt road, and both parties camped that night near Culpepper Court House. On the next morning, we passed through the Town, and camped one mile below. We had good roads for the march, but the weather was very cold.

Colonel Robertson, of the 5th Texas, after the promotion of General Hood, received the appointment of Brigadier-General.—

He gave F. L. Price, Adjutant of the 4th Texas, the appointment of Assistant Adjutant-General. Captain Littlefield, of the 5th, was appointed Quartermaster. Dr. Scott, of the 1st, Aid-de-camp.

On the 3d of November, the camp was moved to the battle field of Cedar Run, six miles from the Town. Here we had but little to do, but to watch the enemy, and guess what would be his next strategy.

On the 18th, the Hampton Legion was detached from our Brigade, Lieutenant-Colonel Garey, being promoted to the Colonelcy. This is a noble regiment, and we regret the removal.

McCLELLAN'S REMOVAL.

When Lincoln and his friends learned that Lee had headed McClellan off from the great Mecca of their hopes, whither in their pilgrimage, they had been journeying as earnestly and as circuitously as Moses for the Promised Land—for so many long days and wearisome nights—while their clothes were waxing old, and being burnt, and much of their meat and bread was being captured by Jackson in the wilderness; and thousands of their carcasses were falling on the way—whose bones could not be carried along in their journeyings to the land they were going to possess, they determined to be revenged on some body, and as they could not manage Lee, they determined to decapitate McClellan.

And so it was when the great Napoleon, (who never has won a battle yet,) was doing his best—feeling the strength of our army; and contemplating a “change of base,” and in company and conversation with General Burnside at the lone hour of midnight on the 7th of Nov., an unwelcome courier arrived from Washington, and informed him that he should be captain no longer, and that he should not lead this great army over to the promised possession.—For he had acted “unadvisedly” with the men in his march—not that he had led them by the wrong way, but that he had let the captain of the hosts on the other side, get possession of the fords, so that he could not “make the crossing.” At these sad tidings, Mac was sorely troubled, and wept much—and Burnside wept—and there was great lamentation and weeping throughout the camp. And Lincoln killed him, and he gave up the ghost, and went to Jersey, and his grave has not been seen until this day, for nobody has buried him.

BATTLE OF FREDERICKSBURG.

As soon as Burnside was placed in supreme command, he began to devise a strategy by which he could capture the Confederate City. After making all his arrangements, he opened a tremendous fire upon our lines, with the hope of getting away from his position, by hiding behind the smoke of his artillery. He made a bold and rapid move for Hanover Junction. And, on arriving at Fredericksburg, he hastily demanded the surrender of the City. But imagine his surprise when General Lee, who he thought still at Culpepper, answered his demand—"I do not wish to occupy the Town myself, and you shall not," to which Burnside agreed, for it was a "military necessity."

We had left our camp on the 19th, and crossed the Rapidan on the Railroad bridge late in the evening; on the next day, we marched sixteen miles; and on the 21st, camped near Spottsylvania Court House. On Saturday morning, we moved up to the Fredericksburg Railroad, and camped within four miles of the old City. The rain fell almost incessantly, and the roads were very muddy over the entire march.

As it was evident that the enemy intended attempting a crossing as soon as he could make the necessary preparations, General Lee and his officers examined the ground, and made ready for his reception. On the night of the 10th of December, they began to throw their pontoons across the river, at the City—and to defend them, they opened fire with artillery, at daylight on Thursday morning, which they kept up all day, at the rate of sixty shot per minute. Thus protected, they finally succeeded, with two Brigades, after many attempts and much loss. About a mile and a half below, another bridge was thrown over, and by noon on the 11th, was completed. The position was such, that we could offer but little resistance. On the 12th, under cover of the darkness, and a dense fog, a large force passed the river, and took position on the south-side, under protection of their guns on the other shore. But notwithstanding the terrible fire of a hundred guns, which raked every street and lane of the city, Barksdale's Mississippi Brigade held the Town. They had resisted the bridge-builders with energy, and now kept them at bay in the streets. From the enemy's guns, the houses were shattered and set on fire in many places. This incessant fire of artillery was kept up upon the doomed City, from dawn till dark. When night closed down upon the scene, and hushed the roar of cannon, the burning houses of helpless women and children, who were driven out to wander through the dark, and over the frozen ground, without shelter or fires; destitute of food, and some of them of clothes—lit the landscape, and still revealed the barbarity of the cruel and heartless invader. Harmless old men, women and children, were slaughtered in the streets, and even in their own houses. But Heaven is preparing a righteous retribution for them in the very streets which they have so wickedly baptized with innocent blood. And we are persuaded that the slaughter with which they are soon to be visited in Fredericksburg, is but the introduction to the miseries with which their foul souls will soon be familiar.

Our gallant men had fallen back to the edge of the town; and those noble Mississippians were relieved by Gen. Cobb's Brigade, supported by Cook's command. Their position was behind a stone wall, and in ditches, while the enemy occupied the houses, in the out-skirts of the town.

Of the 18th Georgia, we have good news on this occasion—for after they had maintained their position a long time, relief was sent up, that they might have a little rest; but their reply was—"This is as good a place as we want," and refused to go, but continued at their work, as if they intended to finish the "job" before they quit.

Here it was that General Cobb was killed, and General Cook was wounded.

Saturday morning, Dec. 13th.—On the right wing, while it was yet dark from the heavy fog, the enemy commenced feeling Jackson's position, and advancing in heavy force. About 9 o'clock, A. M., the fog was lifted, and their position and numbers were in view. In a few minutes the battle was joined. The strength of the artillery on both sides was now displayed. More than two hundred guns were belching forth their sulphuric flames, filling the fields and the heavens with hideous sights and unearthly sounds. The positions of our guns were well selected, commanding all the regions below, and sweeping the enemy down by hundreds as they moved on to the attack, or changed positions in the fight. Toward evening the infantry, sixty thousand strong, moved up to drive our men from their position. Then ensued a struggle of terror, full of grandeur. The long-drawn roar of musketry, with fitful gleams of fire, uniting with the bellowing surges of artillery, stunned the ear and made the earth vibrate beneath the feet. Every species of projectile known to modern warfare was hurled back and forth, from guns of every pattern and calibre. At the onset they forced A. P. Hill back upon the second line, but by its aid, under command of General Early, they were soon driven back under their guns, and it was not until after dark that the fighting ceased. They had been repulsed at every point, and were gradually falling back. Before the day-light had gone, we could discover their confusion. But we had no idea as to the extent of the demoralization and slaughter they had suffered. Over the ground where A. P. Hill met them, hundreds were left, dead and dying. Hundreds more were slaughtered on the left wing, while the artillery had slain them all over the field. But we did not suppose they would so easily abandon the high-way to the "Rebel Capital." We had not brought one-fourth of our men into the fight. Many on each wing had not fired a gun, while the centre, except Hood's right wing, had all the while been but playing the spectator, to the scenes below. General Stuart did valuable service throughout the whole fight.

On Sunday-morning, Gen'l Lee expected them to renew the attack in full force, and with great violence. But instead of an attack, a flag of truce was sent in, for permission to bury the dead and care for the wounded. The petition was granted; and after occupying the day in carrying the wounded to the other side of the river, there were still hundreds not removed.

On Monday, the great Yankee army en route for Richmond, was drawn out and marshaled over the lands below. As many as sixty thousand were in full view from one point. They displayed all their stars and stripes with all the pomp and circumstance of Yankee glory; but instead of renewing the fight, as was expected, they waited until dark, and then begun "a change of base." At day-light next morning "Burnside non est" was the general rumor.— He and his army had adopted the old maxim—

"He who fights and runs away,
May live to fight another day."

THE RESULT: Our loss is about three thousand, in killed and wounded and missing. General Gregg was mortally wounded.— The Yankees lost about eighteen thousand, killed and wounded, and one thousand six hundred and twenty-six prisoners. Several general officers fell. Burnside, among other reasons assigned for this defeat, while before the Court of Inquiry, states that Lincoln had told him that “he did not want the Army of the Potomac destroyed.” This being the case, we agree with him and his officers in council of war, that the only way to prevent its total destruction, was to move them out of harm’s way as soon as possible, and place them on the other side of the river, and then cut the bridges; which he informs the court he “did with success.”

What a terrible retribution for their slaughtering those innocent ones in the city, and destroying the furniture, clothing, &c., in all the houses, and then setting fire to the buildings to consume what they had left. Their dead were left in every street, and scores were found in the shattered houses.

This is the fourth defeat, of the grand army of the Union, in its “on to Richmond.” And this last repulse, must prove, if possible, more disastrous than the preceding. For the defeat of their whole army, which must have numbered one hundred and forty thousand strong, which Burnside in his telegram to Washington says, had crossed the river, by about fifteen thousand of our own, will have a powerful effect on the minds of their soldiers, as well as the public mind of the Northern people. And as to the influence it will have abroad, I have but little care; for it is not to the nations that we should look for help, but to Him who made the nations, and “giveth the kingdom to whomsoever he will.”

The “New York World” says, that their “army will now go into winter quarters, because it can go no where else.” But if it should attempt to go any where else, we suppose General Lee will be there, waiting for them when they arrive.

A few more such defeats will give us peace. For a peace-party is already forming in the North. This is the reaction. The ebbing of a tide, which has flown beyond all bounds, assisted by every prejudice, and driven and lashed by the storm of envy and fanaticism. And a peace-party, originated by blood and suffering, cannot be checked. It may be next spring before they will give us another chance; but, whenever they do, it will end this unholy war.

BY WHAT NAME SHALL WE CALL THEM?

Abolitionist, Unionist, Federalists or Yankces. We should speak the same language, with as much concert as we should act together in the strife. All of the above names, have by different ones, and by the same ones, at different times, been applied to our enemy.—Words and names are the signs of ideas, and the vehicles of thought. We then should adopt the vehicle which would most certainly convey our meaning. Names are also significant. And while we would represent and convey our thoughts in words, those words should be properly selected, that our whole meaning—nothing more nor less—may be understood. Each of the above names are significant, and have a different meaning, and it is impossible that they can, with propriety, be indiscriminately applied. Then to determine which is the more, or rather the only applicable one, let us notice the meaning of each.

Abolitionist: says Webster, is one who is desirous of abolishing any thing, especially slavery. This word then will apply, provided the abolition of slavery is their only object and aim. But all will say that this is not their sole avowed intention—but to subjugate and despoil—make the South their inferior, and the bearer of their burdens, &c.

Unionist: one who desires concord agreement in mind, will, affections and interest. This, we readily see, will not apply to them. For there can be no union where there is discord—that they desire the South to remain in union of government with them is evident, but they seek a union which is a moral impossibility. And the name does not convey to the mind, their true character.

Federalist: says Webster, is an appellation in America, given to the friends of the Constitution of the United States, and to the political party which favored the Administration of President Washington.

I have but to inquire if they have been the friends of the Constitution? or have they not declared that sacred instrument to be "a covenant with death, and a league with hell!" Have they favored that line of policy pursued by the great champion of liberty—who so successfully lead the armies of the first rebellion against oppression and tyranny, to victory, and finally to a peace as broad and as deep as the rivers? I know when you have learned the meaning of the name, you blush to know that you have ever soiled the native dignity of the name by which your ancestor were known, by applying it to a nation of thieves and murderers.

The next and last, is the only one that will apply. YANKEE: The popular name for the citizens of New England. This is what Webster says it means—and this is what we want—a name for the people of New England. And, as their history is well known to the civilized world, the whole world will understand us, and we will understand ourselves when we call them YANKEES. It is the only name or word in the English, or any other language, living or dead, that can be applied with full scope and force. It extends to all their ten thousand schemes of deception and fraud, and comprehends their every act of lying and stealing, from the days of Washington till the present hour, in all their political, legislative, executive, commercial, civil, moral, literary, sacred, profane, theological and diabolical history.

The word, has ever been used in contemptuous ridicule of their conduct towards each other, and their dealings with the rest of the world. And there is no other word in all the range of human learning, which will convey to the mind of every man, both in Europe and America, in Africa and the Islands of the Sea, so many, and correct traits of character, as the word YANKEE, when applied to the Yankee. And thus applied, it means meddlesome, impudent, insolent, pompous, boastful, unkind, ungrateful, unjust, knavish, false, deceitful, cowardly, swindling, thieving, robbing, brutal and murderous.

With this name, we involuntarily associate the story of the Clock Peddler who stole the land-lady's counterpane off of her own bed, and then sold it to her—shoe-soles made of birch-bark, wooden hams, patent medicines, chalk milk and wooden nutmegs. It carries us back to days of yore, and enables us to look at the different phases of society, from the time they burnt old women for witches to the days of the inauguration of the "woman's-rights conventions." Exhibiting the style of dress worn by Puritans in beautiful contrast with the fast age that puts their women in breeches.

This Yankee country has given birth to Socialism, Mormonism, Millerism, Spiritualism and Abolitionism, with every other Devilism which has cursed the nation of Unionism. And, as there is one word that will express all these and a hundred more isms, I prefer to use that word, and thereby say all that can be said on this subject—the term is YANKEEISM. And we will call them Yankees; General Beauregard and the newspapers to the contrary, notwithstanding.

BIOGRAPHIC SKETCHES OF GEN'L HOOD AND STAFF.

As these sketches will be of interest to our friends at home, I take pleasure in transcribing them from my journal for publication.

Brigadier General John B. Hood was born in Owensville, Bath county, Ky., June 29th, 1831, and was brought up at Mt. Sterling, Montgomery county. He entered upon his collegiate course at West Point, in 1849, and graduated in 1853. He was then assigned to duty in the 4th Infantry in California, where he served twenty-two months. And when the two new regiments, raised by Jefferson Davis, then Secretary of War, were called out, he was transferred July, '55, to the one (2d cavalry) in which Gen. Albert Sidney Johnston, who fell at Shiloh, was in command, and Gen'l R. E. Lee, the Lieut. Colonel. This regiment furnished many valuable officers to the South. Gen'ls Earl Van Dorn, E. K. Smith, Fields, Evans and Hardee were from its ranks.

In the winter of 1855-'6, Gen. Hood entered upon the frontier service of Western Texas, where, in July following, he had a spirited engagement, and was wounded by the Indians on Devil's river.

A short time before the beginning of the present war, he was ordered to report for duty at West Point as Instructor of Cavalry. But anticipating the present difficulties, he was allowed at his own request, to return to duty in Texas—his object being, in view of all the prospects of impending dissolution, to be in that portion of the country which he most loved, and so greatly admired. He could see no hope of reconciliation or adjustment, but every indication of a fierce and blood war; consequently, he had determined to cast his destiny with the South. On the 16th of April, 1861, he resigned his commission under the United States Government, and tendered his services to the Confederacy. His name was entered upon the roll with the rank of First Lieutenant, and ordered to report to General Lee, in Virginia, who ordered him to report to General Magruder, on the Peninsula. He was at once placed in command of all the cavalry of the Peninsula, with the rank of Captain of Regular Cavalry. Having several successful engagements with the enemy, he was soon promoted to the rank of Major. On Sept. 30th, he was ordered to Richmond, and receiving the rank of Colonel of Infantry, was placed in command of the 4th Regiment Texas Volunteers, then in camp near the city. Very few of the men had ever seen him, and doubts were entertained whether a Colonel could be appointed, that would give satisfaction. For an attempt had been made to organize the regiment under Colonel Allen, of Texas; but in consequence of a protest of some of the Captains, the appointment was withdrawn. This produced a feeling with others, and it was thought that they would not be satisfied with any one that might be appointed. But in a few days this feeling was gone, and every one seemed to be perfectly satisfied. His commanding appearance, manly deportment, quick perception, courteous manners and decision of character, readily impressed the officers and men, that he was the man to govern them in the camp, and command them on the field. And his thorough acquaintance with every department of the service, satisfied every one of his competency for the position. For they found him able and ready to give all the necessary instruction, not only in drilling them for the field, but also in the forms and technicalities of the clothing, commissary, ordnance and transportation departments—for the want of which information, regiments entering the service frequently go hungry, and commissaries and quartermasters make many fruitless trips.

The General is about six feet two inches high, with full broad chest, light hair and beard, blue eyes, and is gifted by nature with a voice that can be heard in the storm of battle.

On the 8th and 9th of November, the 4th and 5th Texas Regiments left Richmond, and arrived at Dumfries on the 12th instant, where we were with the 1st to be organized into a Brigade, under Colonel Wigfall, who, to this end, had received the appointment of Brigadier General. But, as he was the Senator elect from the State of Texas, after the meeting of Congress, he resigned. And on the 3d of March, 1862, Colonel Hood was appointed to take his place. Thus we see, within the short space of ten months and seventeen days, he was promoted from the rank of Lieutenant to that of a Brigadier General. And having been personally associated with him during his term of service with the Texas troops, I take pleasure in saying that his rapid promotion, has not filled him with that official vanity and self-importance which so often kills the pleasure, and cuts the acquaintance of former friends.— For while with him, there is no effort to make you feel the dignity of his official position; but you enjoy the pleasure of a social companion, familiar and kind. But as a companion, his friendship cannot be cultivated to an extent that will allow a pretext to the neglect of duty, by either officers or men. He is a disciplinarian; and the discharge of duty is the way to his society and friendship.— And, notwithstanding his rigid adherence to discipline, I am persuaded that he is as much admired and esteemed by the men under his command, as any General in the army. And to this one thing, I would in a great measure, attribute his promotion in rank, and our success in battle. Its importance is admitted by all. For it is this that makes the army of well drilled soldiers so much more efficient than the raw militia. Our success depends upon it; and the sooner our people, our army and our Congress are willing to see it properly enforced, the sooner shall we see our enemy beaten, our liberty won, and our country free.

An army half disciplined, cannot be efficient. For while they are in camp, they are scattered all over the country. While on the march, they are strung from one end of the road to the other.— And the result is, when we have to go into the fight, which is to decide the fate of an empire, one-half of the army is not there, and a few must meet the foe, and do the work of all. And when the fight is over, the straggler comes in for a portion of the honor, and will claim an equal share of the blessing of liberty, which has been won by the toil and blood of others.

But absence from the labors of the camp and from the dangers of battle, are not all the evils growing out of this loose method of soldiering. If you will but go round through this city, (Winchester, Va.,) and adjacent country, or any where else, that our army has either camped or moved, you will find abundant argument for a more thorough adherence to army regulations than we have yet had. Men straggling every where, and doing almost every thing—begging, taking, destroying, stealing and robbing almost every one they pass, of nearly every thing they have, until our country groans to be delivered from its friends. And what difference whether a man is robbed of his bread by a friend or a foe? Will he not perish, and his children starve, whether it is taken by the one or the other? Does any one doubt whether or not such things are done by our own men? I ask you to go to the people and ask them. We know it is so. For we have seen it with our own eyes more than a hundred times. And now, in all candor, we ask, are these things so to continue? Are we to leave desolate in our rear, and gaunt hunger to feed upon the lives of helpless women and innocent children? If so, would a home under Austrian oppression not be preferable?

But how are all these evils to be remedied? How are the men to be prevented straggling from the camp and along the march?—From robbing the country as they move, and brought up to the fight, so that all will fare alike in the burdens of the campaign and in the battles for our country? The answer is simple, and in a single word—DISCIPLINE.

All that is now necessary to make the name of Hood immortal, and fill the earth with the fame of the soldiers of Texas, is to bring forward a sufficient number of men to fill up the gallant regiments—now the honor of the Army of the Potomac—under his command, and add to their number some eight or ten new regiments of those now in Mississippi and Arkansas, and give him the rank of Major General. All of which we hope will shortly be done. Then our movements will not depend upon the inefficient and tardy movements of other officers and troops. But, thus constituting an independent Army Division of Texans, we will not have to watch and wait and fall back from ground hardly won, to keep from being flanked by the enemy from other portions of the field, after we have beaten and driven our foe in the fight. No one can look back over the history of past engagements without being struck with the brilliant dash and successful charges made by our men; and seeing how rapidly they press to the front, none will fail to admit the importance of their being supported by men of their own metal, and under the same commander, so that they can support themselves in the contest, and hold the ground they have conquered.—The records of Gaines' Farm, Plains of Manassas, and Sharpsburg, give sufficient comment upon its importance. For on each one of these fields they had to halt, and sometimes fall back from ground which had cost the lives of many of our men to conquer, to prevent being flanked by troops that should have been engaged, and driven from the field by other portions of our army; and, instead of our falling back, the whole of the enemy's line would have been hurled back in one grand rout, and driven in confusion before our conquering march. Other troops are brave enough, but they fight too slow. We want more of our own men. Men who, when the fight begins, will not stand and "listen the battle shout from far," but will rush forward at the word, and carry the field by storm. These are the men, and this the modus operandi for success. For when the enemy's lines are once driven from their advanced position, they should not be allowed to "face about," and form on new ground; but pressed and shot in the back, until they have effected a splendid "change of base."

Some of our men, both in and out of the army, are trying to make the impression, that our men are used by the Government, as a kind of portable breast-work for Virginia; and that they are required to occupy positions of danger, to screen the other portions of the army. But this is wrong. For we have seen as much of the treatment of the Government and of the officers of the army towards our men, as any body else, and we have been able to discover no such discrimination. But on the contrary, we have had our share of favors in almost every thing. And in many instances, we have been favored more than others. It may be possible, that the President will not give up our command, to be controlled and disposed of as some desire, but there are not many of our men that have complained even on that point. And if any are disposed to think that we have had to march further; and fight harder than other troops, I ask them to get the history of Jackson's campaign, and compare it with ours. They have marched further and fought oftener than we have. See also the history of Col. Law's Brigade, who have been with us in all our fights, and marches, too; and were in the battle at Manassas, before we left Texas. That we have had to perform long marches, and do hard fighting, I do not deny. This was what we came for, and the men were willing to do it. But that we have had to occupy all the most dangerous places on the battle-field, is incorrect; and this idea should not be allowed to obtain, for it has no foundation in fact. True, in two or three instances, when the fortunes of the day hung trembling upon the command of a single Regiment or Brigade, we have been called to the rescue. And of all the positions on the field, our men would, if left to their own choice, have stood upon the very ground where they fought. For they were willing that none should occupy more dangerous ground, do more, nor win greater laurels for their State than themselves. They had come to fight, and were willing to stand where the storm broke in its fury. And none have made a brighter record.

It is also stated, that an attempt is being made to remove our Regiments beyond the Mississippi, to rest and recruit—put upon the invalid list! We have no doubt, but that the motive which prompted our friends, is the love which they have for the men of our State. But that it is not from a broad philanthropy, which embraces the whole Confederacy, nor with a proper view to the final success of our arms, will be apparent to all. And especially will this appear, when they read the letter of the Commander-in-Chief of the Army to Gen. Wigfall, and there see the importance and confidence he places in them in view of success. As this letter will give pleasure and pride to every Texan, both at home and in other portions of our army, I here spread it before the reader. It was written four days after the battle at Sharpsburg, where our men covered themselves with glory on the field.

HEADQUARTERS ARMY OF VIRGINIA,
NEAR MARTINSBURG, Sept. 21, 1862. }

GEN. LEWIS T. WIGFALL—

GENERAL: I have not yet heard from you, with regard to the new Texas Regiments, which you promised to endeavor to raise for the army. I need them much. I rely upon those we have in all tight places, and fear I have to call upon them too often. They have fought grandly and nobly, and we must have more of them.

Please make every possible exertion to get them in, and send them on to me. You must help us in this matter. With a few more such Regiments as Hood now has, as an example of daring and bravery, I could feel much more confident of the campaign.

Very respectfully, yours,

R. E. LEE, General.

I now ask, if, in view of the importance which we sustain to the final success of our cause, in which our all—life, liberty, and sacred honor, both for ourselves and our children is embarked, there is a single Texan that will say for us to return, or refuse to send us the men to fill up our thinned ranks? We think not. And we hope our friends will not, by persisting in their opposition in this matter, strike the honors which we have won for the "I one Star" flag from our hands. Such efforts do harm. They tend to make the men dissatisfied, and feel that they are badly treated—worse than others—which is not so. And what would be the effect produced upon our army, if the request to remove our Regiments home, were granted? Arkansas would soon file her claim, and then Louisiana, and Mississippi, and so on, until the last man would be sent out of Virginia, to his own State. And there is no one so blind that he has failed to see the just indignation which the whole country pours upon the Governor of Georgia, for the factious opposition which he has raised against the Government. And all are proud to see the people and soldiers of that State condemning his course in unmeasured terms. He wants to be noticed.

We hope that the Legislature of North Carolina will be made to feel the withering contempt that now rests upon Gov. Brown, for the course it has recently taken.

This course persisted in, and it will not require the foresight of a prophet to tell the future destiny of our young Republic, in honor to whose arms the lips of the nations of Europe now glow with anxious praise. And McClellan would no longer be under the necessity of transforming a grand "skedaddle" into a "strategic movement," nor a dreadful defeat into a "change of base." But the iron yoke of despotism would be riveted upon our necks, and the heel of Yankee oppression grind our children in the dust. We call upon our countrymen, one and all, to lay aside all their sectional prejudices and selfishness, and let the whole people, burning with the living fire of patriotism, view the grandeur of our cause, and still rally around our country's battle-flag, and help us roll the tide of victory onward, and by the grace of God we will come off conquerers in the end. Let Texas send us the men, and with Hood to lead them, we feel safe in saying, they will make a bright record in our country's history, while they hasten the end of our toil and suffering. Texas need not fear; for if an attempt is made to invade the State, troops will be sent to her relief. For the Western Army must in a great measure be subsisted from the Prairies of Texas.

Since penning the above lines, I am proud to learn that Hood has been made a Major General, and the President has ordered the desired number of Texans; and a messenger has gone to bring them forward. We will hail their coming with pleasure, and promise them for a leader, one of the best officers in the Confederacy, who has never been incapacitated for a single moment from commanding his men by intemperance; nor been absent from the post of duty twenty-four hours, from the time he took command of the 4th, (Oct. 1st, 1861,) up to the present time, (Dec. 25th, 1862.)

W. H. SELLERS, A. A. G.,

was born in Tennessee, and emigrated to Texas in '35; was a member of the celebrated Mier Expedition, captured Dec., '42, and held a prisoner in Mexico and Perote twenty-one months.

In the spring of '46, he entering the service in the Mexican war, was made 1st Lieutenant in Capt. Tom Green's Company of Col. Hay's Regiment of Rangers, and was present at the battle of Monterey, September, '46.

In 1861, he entered the service of the Confederacy, with the rank of 1st Lieutenant of Co. A, 5th Texas Regiment; and when the Regiment was organized, received the appointment of Adjutant, which office he filled until March, '62, when he was appointed Assistant Adjutant General on General Hood's Staff, with the rank of Captain. In this position he has given the most entire satisfaction. And of his coolness and gallantry on the field, he has had no superior, rendering the most efficient service in every battle, especially at Gaines' Farm, Manassas and Sharpsburg, having his horse shot at Manassas, and twice at Sharpsburg. But he has passed unhurt through every fight.

CAPTAIN JAMES HAMILTON, A. D. C.

Is a native of South Carolina, and in his twenty-second year. He entered West Point in 1858, and continued until his State seceded, when he resigned; and returning, tendered his services to his country, and was placed upon the Staff of General Taylor. With him, he continued, acting gallantly and with credit to himself through the engagements around Richmond—after which, at his own request, he was transferred to the Staff of General Hood. At Sharpsburg, his horse was shot under him. And although his coolness and gallantry enabled him to go when and wherever sent—not shunning to pass through the midst and fury of the battle—eliciting the praise of the Generals upon different occasions; yet he has passed all unscared and unhurt, with the honor of having been under fire on fourteen different occasions—some of them, the bloodiest of the campaign.

Notwithstanding his youthful appearance and delicate constitution, with rather effeminate features; he has a brave heart and lion-like courage—that predict for him a future as brilliant, as his record is clear and honorable.

MAJOR B. H. BLANTON, A. I. G.

Is a Kentuckian, and from Frankfort. He took position on the Staff on the 1st of May, and was in every battle with the Brigade up to the 1st of October. At Gaines' Farm his horse was killed, and at Sharpsburg he met with the same misfortune. His unflinching courage and gallantry, won for him the high respect and praise of the command. He received an appointment as Major in the Quartermaster's Department in Kentucky, and started for that army, but on arriving in Richmond, was allowed to return, and is yet with our command. And as he is a favorite with all, his return will be greeted with pleasure by both officers and men.

LIEUTENANT D. H. SUBLETT, ORDNANCE OFFICER,

Is from Waco, Texas. He entered the service a Lieutenant in Co. E, 4th Regiment, from his Town—and served in that capacity until the 16th of March, 1862, when he was received as a Volunteer-Aid to General Hood. And on the 1st of May he was made Ordnance Officer of the Brigade. In all these positions, he discharged his duty with satisfaction and credit.

COLONEL JOHN MARSHALL,* . . .

Commanding the 4th Texas, was born in Charlotte County, Virginia, in the year 18—. He was at one time Editor of the Vicksburg "Sentinel," and afterwards took charge of the "Mississippian" at Jackson. And at the earliest solicitation of the leading members of the Democratic party of the State of Texas, he disposed of his interest in the "Mississippian," and removed from Jackson, Mississippi, to the City of Austin, Texas, where he conducted the "State Gazette," which was the leading organ of the Democratic party; and having made a reputation as a party leader and an able writer, was elected Chairman, of the Democratic State Convention at Austin, in 1858, over Governor Peas, by a considerable majority. (And as a testimonial of the manner in which the party appreciated him as a leader, they presented him a fine gold headed cane.) He continued to hold this position until he left Texas to join the army in Virginia.

Colonel Marshall was a literary man, of liberal views and fine attainments—an excellent writer and a close logical reasoner, of quick preception and excellent forecast, in so much that he did not wait the full development of events, in order to comprehend the end and aim of politicians, before the results of their policy were seen and understood by the masses. His friends knew well the value of his services, and his enemies felt the weight of his opposition.

When the 4th Regiment Texas Volunteers was organized, he received the appointment of Lieutenant-Colonel, and although the appointment was not altogether satisfactory, the Regiment soon learned to appreciate his value. For, possessing high business qualifications, and being a warm personal friend of the President, they found that through him they would be able to procure all the necessaries and comforts for the campaign, that would be enjoyed by the most favored.

* I should have taken great pleasure in giving a Lithograph of Colonel M., as well as a more extended biography had it been in my power, but not having his likeness, nor the data, I have furnished all that I could under the circumstances.

He was ever watchful for the well-being of the Regiment, and fared and shared with them, both by day and night. Many officers, when there is no prospect of an immediate approach of the enemy, leave their post in camp, and spend a week or two at a time in the city or town nearest at hand. But Colonel M preferred the post of duty to the place of pleasure. He was promoted to the Coloneley on the 3d of March, 1862.

We had no braver man in our army than he was. But he, it seems, was not long allowed an opportunity, to show his devotion to his country, and his gallantry on the field, until the missile of death sought and found the shining mark. Colonel Marshall fell, pierced by a minnie ball, on the field of Gaines' Farm, on the 27th of June. He had been in the battle of Eltham's Landing and Seven Pines, and was just wheeling with his Regiment to make one of the most brilliant charges known in history, when he fell from his horse.

And we have reliable information, that, had he survived this bloody scene, he would have received the promotion of Brigadier-General.

His death will be felt and regretted, not only by the army, but the State of Texas will mourn his fall.

LIEUTENANT-COLONEL BRADFUTE WARWICK.

Was the son of Corban Warwick, of Richmond Virginia; born November 24th, 1839, and entered upon the study of medicine—having been thoroughly prepared, at the University of Virginia in his 17th year.

This profession, however, was not his first choice; for with an ardent temperament and ambitious aspiration, he preferred a life of more hazardous enterprize. But his parents not consenting, and much preferring the life of a civilian for him, he reluctantly yielded his own ambition to their wishes. And as a second choice, begun the study of medicine—with their approbation—as it opened up before his young and aspiring mind, the widest field of benevolence and usefulness. That he did not enter upon this arduous field of labo. with a view to its lucrative rewards, is quite evident, from the fact that the great wealth of his family, made it unnecessary that he should subject himself to the trials and labors, the fatigue and exposures to which this calling would necessarily lead. His estate would have furnished him all the comforts and luxuries of life. But not willing to live in the enjoyment of the world's blessings, without being a blessing to others, he placed his eye upon an exalted mark, and soon his foot-print is seen in the path that leads to a high circle of usefulness.

After attending a course of lectures at the Medical College in Richmond, he entered the Medical College of New York, where he graduated at the close of the first year, and not only received a diploma, but quite a complementary one. And being only nineteen, he felt unwilling to assume the responsibilities of a profession, in which he would be charged with the life of others, at so early an age—yet unwilling to spend his time in idleness, and also desiring to leave no branch of his profession unattained, even in its highest degree, he went to Paris and prosecuted his studies until the following summer. When the exercises of the College suspended, he concluded to spend a few months in a tour through Europe, visiting the battle-field of Solferino, Venice, and many other places—returning to Paris, he made a pedestrian tour of the Desert.

On resuming his studies, his health began to fail, and he was advised to travel. This was welcome counsel to him, and he immediately determined on a trip to the East, where every city and village, every town and hamlet, every mountain and valley, river, spring, and almost every rock is the subject of history—either ancient or modern, sacred or profane. Italy, Greece and Turkey, afforded a wide field of pleasure and literary investigation to his well cultivated mind. But his trip through Asia and Africa were of greater interest, for, although not more classic than the former, yet there was more adventure than in other countries. He often wrote back to his friends, the most graphic accounts of the ancient relics and living generation through which he passed. And it was his lot to be in Palestine on the eve of the great massacre of the Christians by the Drauses.

On his return from Jericho, his party of seventeen men encountered a band of Arabs, seventy in number, which they put to flight after a severe conflict, in which they killed several of the marauders, and lost one of their own men. On their arrival at Jerusalem, they were received with the wildest enthusiasm by the inhabitants. For the savages had been roaming the country and robbing travellers for years, and this was the first time they had been overcome for a long period.

Having visited almost all the places of interest in the country where Prophets and Apostles had dwelt and traveled, and where the Saviour of the world had lived and taught, he returned via Constantinople to Europe. On his arrival in Italy, he found it in commotion. Italy, long bound and trodden under foot, was struggling to be free. And ere he was aware, all his desires for military life, which he had yielded at the request of his parents, were revived, and he was fired anew with the prospect of entering upon the profession of arms. But as he had declined a course which he felt would give uneasiness and pain to those whom the scriptures taught him to obey, and thereby failed to receive a course of training at West Point, qualifying himself for the science of war, and having qualified himself to heal, and not to inflict wounds, he could not feel willing to offer himself in any other capacity than that of a Surgeon in the army. But presenting himself to Garibaldi, which was in the following language, viz: "I wish the appointment of Surgeon, because I think by it, I can do more good, but place me any where, if you do not, I will get me a rifle and fight on my own hook. For to fight or physic in this war, I am determined"—he was unable to conceal that fire, which, no doubt, he had long since believed to be extinct. And we will here remark that his parents had but little idea when they objected to his military course, that he would fall on the bloody field, and in the terrible charge which should disconcert the foe, and contribute so largely to the relief of Richmond, his native city, from a state of siege.

The great Dictator received him cordially, and gave him a place on the Medical Staff as he desired. But he did not remain long on this duty. It was too near the place for which his ambition was struggling, when he abandoned the idea of a military career. At the end of two months, he resigned his commission and took his place in the ranks as a common soldier. But the eye of his leader was upon him, and having a knowledge of men as well as of nations, he gave him a commission; and serving in his new capacity—to the great satisfaction of the Commander, he was called out on the battle-field and promoted to the rank of Captain, for his bravery and daring during the engagement.

It was at Palermo, that he identified his fortunes with this military chieftan, and he continued with him, until he arrived in triumph at Capua. During this time, Lieutenant-Colonel W. participated in eleven regular engagements, besides many skirmishes; and also rendered much valuable service in other important matters connected with the success of the campaign. At one time he was sent over into Calabria as a spy, and by the successful manner in which he performed this duty, won for himself the Cross of the Legion of Honor. At another time, he was sent to London, recruiting for the Dictator's army, of which the "Southern Literary Messenger" speaks in the following language:

"What an example Doctor Bradfute Warwick has set the young men of wealth throughout the South! Scorning the delights of Parisian life, and burning with love of the sacred cause of liberty, he joined the army of Garibaldi. Not content with this, he repaired to London, and by his personal exertions succeeded in enlisting three hundred recruits, many of them, like himself, young gentlemen of family and fortune. Deeds like this must not be permitted to go unpraised. We trust our young Virginian may share fully the undying fame which shall attach to the deliverers of Italy. It will be a proud day for him when the shout of liberated millions shall proclaim, "Italia is free!" a day worth ten thousand years of the stagnant, idle, useless, semi-idiotic existence which the great mass of men born to wealth pursue."

It has been our pleasure to read in the Richmond "Dispatch," a short sketch of him, after his return from this brilliant tour in the East which so beautifully and correctly presents the bearing and deeds of this gallant young officer, that we give it in full.

AN OFFICER OF GARIBALDI.

"We had yesterday the pleasure of meeting with Doctor Bradfute Warwick, who, as our readers are aware, has been serving with Garibaldi throughout his late campaign. We have rarely been more pleased with a rencountre. Doctor W. is an exceedingly intelligent young man, and gave us a most interesting account of his adventures. They are narrated with great modesty, and without the least appearance of bravado or presumption. Doctor Warwick is but twenty-one, and yet he has already been in eleven pitched battles and innumerable skirmishes. He joined Garibaldi at Palermo, fought in all his battles and left him only when he resigned at Capua. Doctor W. is a Captain in the Sardinian service, Victor Emanuel having adopted the soldiers of Garibaldi. He literally fought his way up, from a common soldier to a Captain, in six months! That speaks far more than Captain Warwick's modesty allows him to say."

On his return from Calabria, he received information of the troubles in his native land. He immediately resigned, and set out for America. On reaching Paris, he ascertained that the "Vanderbilt" was ready to sail for the United States. He made all his arrangements, and registered his name with the passengers on board, and set-sail on his homeward-bound voyage on the following morning. His eye and heart were fixed on home; and his mind was occupied, and his thoughts absorbed, with the new and undeveloped events about to transpire on a theatre to which he was more nearly allied. He had entered the army in the Old World to assist in the common cause of Liberty. But Home and Liberty are now blended in the same scene. When he started out on his trans-atlantic journey, he left a nation smiling with peace, and rejoicing in prosperity and wealth, but what was to be the condition of affairs, and the state of public feeling on his return, was left to conjecture. And as the vessel was bound for a northern port, he knew not the destiny that awaited him on his arrival. And thus through the whole period which elapsed from the time he embarked, until he reached the American Continent, he was the subject of alternate hopes and fears. But on his arrival, the storm-cloud, which, in its course, was to sweep over—first brightning, and then blasting his brilliant career, had not sufficiently culminated, nor broken over his path, to prevent him pursuing his way unmolested.

On reaching home, although passionately fond of his family, he remained but a short time. The sound of the bugle was moving the heart of a great nation, like the wind moves the waves of the mighty deep. But as Virginia had not formally placed herself in the ranks with her Southern sisters, he could not enter the service under the folds of "Sic Semper Tyrannis." Consequently he hastened to join the Southern army. For the cause for which they had begun to martial their hosts was that of freedom, and having already offered himself upon that altar, he hastened to the place where the camp fires were burning, and whether Virginia ever became a member of the Southern Confederacy or not, he determined to identify himself with the Southern cause, and become a member of the Southern army. He reached Charleston, only in time to see Fort Sumter surrender to Beauregard, which he regretted, as he wished to participate in every contest for liberty.

When the Ordinance of Secession was passed, and Virginia became a Southern State, he returned, and with the rank of Captain, was placed on the Staff of General Wise, in Western Virginia—who was often heard to speak of his young Aid in the warmest terms; and when the Texas troops were organized near Richmond, he was honored with the appointment of Major to the 4th Regiment, in consequence of his military reputation and daring spirit.

When Hood took rank as Brigadier-General, Major Warwick was made Lieutenant-Colonel, and as there had been no opportunity of testing the coolness and bravery of their young Virginia officer, many of the men had their fears as to his efficiency on the field. But at the battle of Eltham's Landing, he satisfied them that he would not only stand his ground, but was ready to advance and meet the foe. He here won great credit for himself, even among western soldiers. From this time, he won upon the feelings and confidence of those who had objected to him, because he was a Virginian—not because they did not like Virginians, but because of their own State pride—they felt that we should have had Texans for our officers, which feeling, I believe, is common with the soldiers of every State.

At the battle of Gaines' Farm, June 27th, Colonel Marshall fell soon after the Regiment entered the field in front of the enemy's guns. Lieutenant-Colonel W. was then in command, and none behaved more gallantly than he did on that day. As we were advancing, preparatory to that memorable charge which broke the right arm of the enemy's power, he picked up a battle-flag which had been left by some of our troops on the field, and carried it in his hand, and waving it over their heads, cheered them on to glory and to victory. But he was not long to enjoy this triumph in the full bright beams, with which it will radiate the brow of his command in future time. He had passed the second line of the enemy's defences with his men, and was about to plant his flag upon a battery which they had captured, when a minnie ball pierced his right breast, and he fell mortally wounded.

Thus ends the brilliant career of one of our most gallant officers, and one of Virginia's bravest sons. A man of military talent, and high literary and social attainments—capable of adorning in the high circle which nature had indicated, and, for which, no pains had been spared in fitting him to move.

The 4th Texas, will, while recounting the incidents of this eventful campaign, ever speak of him in terms of unmeasured praise, and think of his deeds with the greatest pride. While his family will treasure his honors as an inheritance bequeathed, and acknowledge him worthy their ancient name.

And knowing the state of his mind, both before and after he fell, we have reasons to hope that he lives beyond the land of misfortune in the regions of peace. For about two hours before he received that mortal wound, we asked him how he felt in view of the anticipated struggle, he said, "If we have an engagement to-day, I expect to go down." Then how do you feel in view of such a result? He replied, ("I never prayed so fervently, nor so constantly during any day of my life, as I have on this day.")

After a few sentences more, the command moved forward, and on leaving him, we added, "Put your trust in the Son of God, and whether you go down, or come through safely, it shall be well with you." He replied, "I will," and led on to the field.

On the 6th of July, he was relieved by death of, all his sufferings. His funeral was attended by Rev. Dr. Minnegerode.

BRIGADIER-GENERAL J. B. ROBERTSON,

Was born in Woodford County, Kentucky, and at the age of twelve, was left an orphan, and without means. He was bound out for the period of his minority, but by his industry and economy, purchased his liberty at eighteen, and begun the study of medicine as soon as he had made sufficient literary advancement to enable him to do so. He had gone to school regularly, only three months prior to his 18th year.

About the time he completed his course, he left Kentucky with a company of volunteers, to join the Texans in 1835, in their struggle for independence. The battle of San Jacinto was fought while they were en-route from New Orleans to Valasco. They joined in the pursuit of the enemy to the Rio Grande, and he was promoted to the rank of Captain, which he held until the Army of the Republic was furloughed in June, 1837. He then resumed his profession of medicine in Washington County; but owing to the unsettled condition of affairs with Mexico, and the hostilities of the Indians, he was again called to the field, and put in command of a regiment and during the years 1839 and 1840, the savages were made to fear and feel the force of his command. He was an active participant in all the stirring events which transpired from the independence of Texas, both with the Mexicans and Indians, until annexation with the United States.

In 1848, he was elected to the State Legislature, and was one of its ablest and most efficient members. In 1850, he was elected to the State Senate; and at that early day, advocated the necessity of preparing for a contest with the Yankees, which he then saw was coming. He was one of the members of the Convention that passed the Ordinance of Secession, and was one of the first to raise a company and hasten to the contest. He was promoted to the Lieutenant-Colonelcy of the 5th Texas Regiment, on arriving at Richmond. And on the 2d of June, when Colonel Archer received the appointment of Brigadier-General, he took the rank of Colonel.— And as to the gallantry of his conduct at Gaines' Farm, Freeman's Ford, Manassas and Boonsboro Gap, the preceding pages have already testified. Physical exhaustion after the last named battle, was so great, that he had to be hauled off the field; and was thereby prevented from participating in the engagement at Sharpsburg.

But the recommendation of General Hood, and the appointment of this brave officer to the rank of Brigadier-General, November 1st, 1862, speaks more in his praise, than I am able, otherwise, to do. He is now in command of the Texas Brigade, in the Army of the Potomac.

DANIEL COLLINS AND THE BRASS BAND.

This part of our organization has to the mind of many, been of but little advantage in the camps, or service on the field. But to the mind of an observing man, it is evident they have done a great amount of good. For there is nothing better calculated to stir up all the soldier in the composition of the man, than the thrilling strains of martial music, as it rises and swells in harmonious euphony from a well trained band.

When the men are weary and exhausted, its soft notes on the night air, drive away the thoughts of fatiguing marches, and quietly lull the soldier to rest. And the bugle's blast at reveille reminds him, as he is aroused from slumber, that he is a soldier; and to his guardianship has been committed the weal of a great nation, as well as the peaceful enjoyment of his own little home.

This principle was well understood by the great Napoleon, who would have the mothers of France teach their children the science of war, ere they could handle the gun, or could scarcely climb over the door-step. Each little man had his toy drum and corn-stalk gun, and thus grew up from the cradle, a man and a soldier. Napoleon knew that music had a powerful charm upon the soul, and, consequently, by it, held the armies of France chained to his will, and led them through Russian snows and over Alpine mountains, whithersoever he pleased.

But, to make music for the braves, was not all the service rendered by the band. For being organized, they served as guard to the knapsacks and blankets, which the men could not carry into the fight, and also as nurses to the wounded as they were brought in from the battle to the Field Infirmary. And as it was our lot, on two occasions, to be present at these scenes of suffering, we take pleasure in saying, they labored with untiring zeal for days and nights together without sleep, and with but little food.

IMPROVED CONDITION OF THE HOSPITALS.

In the earlier part of the campaign, the sick and wounded suffered much for the want of efficient Surgeons, Nurses, Medicines and Hospital room and appliances generally. The reasons are obvious and many. We had been living at peace with ourselves and with all the nations so long, that we had but very few Surgeons who understood Military Surgery. Many of them had, though practicing Physic for years, never dressed a gun-shot wound. This was, although a great want of skill and fitness for army surgery, more their—and, consequently, our misfortune, than a fault on their part. There are now scores of young men, who had never begun the practice of medicine before the commencement of the war, much better practical surgeons, than any of the surgeons, in whose hands the knife was placed, except a comparatively small number. And while the young men have been thus qualifying themselves, the older ones have been making more than equal advancement.

In the next place, the nurses have acquired a skill and aptness in their duties, which, in a great measure, lessens the annoyance and pain of the sufferers.

The rules and regulations of the Hospitals have also been systematized and adapted to the comfort of the patients, as well as to the convenience of their friends, who come to look after, and do offices of kindness for them.

The room which has been provided, is now ample for any number that will ever, at any one time, have to be quartered for treatment.

The number and improvements in all the various appliances for the hospitals are almost, if not quite, as extensive as the quarters which have been fitted up.

The supply of medicines is yet limited, but the great accessions and improvements, in all the other branches of the healing department are so many and great, that they very much make amends for this desideratum.

And in addition to all the improvements mentioned, the regulations have been so amended as to provide a matron for each Ward. A woman is to be seen supervising the culinary department, the Laundry and Wardrobe, and keeping an eye to the cleanliness of the ward, and neatness of the patients. Nothing could have been suggested, that will add more to the comfort and cheer of these houses of suffering. It is a position of honor, and opens a wide field for usefulness, and deeds of love and mercy to the mothers of our country, which is hailed with as much satisfaction by the soldiers, as it will be a source of pride to the women of the South, as long as they live.

And the last, though not the least among the arrangements, which will add to the comfort of all concerned, that we will here vention, is the quartering of the soldiers of different States together. The importance of so doing is so obvious, both for the comfort of the sick man, and the convenience of his friends, that no one will fail to see and appreciate it.

And although the Surgeon General did take it upon himself, to attempt to give me a little lecture, for quarreling a little with some of the Surgeons at the Chimborazo Hospital, for the manner in which they treated some of our men; yet I will say that the present condition of the Hospitals does great credit to him, both as a Surgeon and a State officer.

And to Dr. Smith, the Post Surgeon at Winchester, the thanks of our men are due, and we take the liberty of tendering them through this medium, for the kindness that we received at his hands. For we have not seen an officer since our connection with the service who labored so incessantly, both day and night, to provide a place and means of comfort for the hundreds of sick and wounded, who were sent to the rear during our Maryland campaign.

Dr. Thomas and the Sisters of Charity, at the Infirmary St. Francis de Sales, have also favored us with all the benefits that kind treatment and attentive nursing could afford.

CONTRIBUTIONS.

In consequence of the immense demands upon the Quartermaster's Department, it has not been able to furnish the requisite amount of clothing, to keep the men from suffering during the winter. And with a view to supplying the deficiency—as we are too far from home, and with many difficulties intervening, to look for help from our friends—the following card, prefaced by the Editor of that excellent paper, made its appearance in the "Whig," on the 5th of November:

"We call attention to the statement below, assured that the citizens of Richmond need no comments from us to induce a prompt response to the simple and touching appeal of the Texans—bravest among the brave. The 4th Texas, to which Mr. Davis is attached, distinguished itself greatly in the battle at Gaines' Farm, where Lieut. Col. Bradfute Warwick fell, while leading it into action.—The 4th Texas has a special claim upon Richmond, which we doubt not will be fully recognized."

TEXANS BAREFOOTED.

RICHMOND, November 4th.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE WHIG:

I have just arrived from Fredericksburg; the prospects are good for a fight, but our men are not all shod. On yesterday evening an order was read on dress parade to the effect that, being bare-footed would not excuse any man from duty. Those who were without shoes, were ordered to make moccasins of raw hide, and stand in their places; and we feel that Texans will come as near discharging their duty as any who will meet the next struggle; but I ask the good people of Richmond and surrounding country, if they will stand by and see them go into the fight without shoes. We are too far from home to look to our friends there for help.— We acknowledge the kindness shown us last winter, and many of the recipients have poured out their life's blood on the soil of Virginia.

We are from the far South, and the cold is severe to us. It will require at least one hundred pairs of shoes, and five hundred pairs of socks to complete one suit for our men. Those who are disposed to contribute, will please send forward their mite to the depot of the Young Men's Christian Association, or the depot of the 4th Texas Regiment, on 15th street, between Main and Cary, over Ratcliff's, and it will be forwarded immediately.

N. A. DAVIS,
Chaplain 4th Texas.

In answer to this appeal, we have received from Miss Virginia Dibrell, (collected from various contributions,) $268 25; Miss Mattie M. Nicholas and Mrs. Garland Hanes. (proceeds of a concert at the Buckingham Female Institute,) ($175 05; from the Ladies Soldiers' Aid Society, New Market, Nelson county, a box filled with clothing; Mrs. Wm. G. Paine, seventy-eight pairs socks; Mr. Wm. Bell, Chairman of the Purchasing Committee of the citizens of Richmond, one hundred pairs of shoes; Young Men's Christian Association, thirty rugs, one hundred and forty-six pairs of drawers, one hundred and nine shirts, ninety-four pairs of gloves, and four hundred and ten pairs socks, besides a number of smaller sums and packages, which have warmed both the feet and hearts of our men; who feel that it is unnecessary to attempt to express their gratitude for these unexpected favors. But, by way of acquitting the claims of the young ladies, the boys are willing to promise to take them home with them, and work for them as long as they live.

In return for the liberality extended to our men, the Brigade, after the battle of Fredericksburg, contributed near $6,000 to the sufferers of this unfortunate city—Hood's Minstrels giving about $400 of that amount.

CONCLUSION.

For the present, we must take leave of the reader, with the promise of continuing our journal until the sunlight of peace returns. And then it is our purpose to present a history of the whole campaign. There may be, and doubtless, are many dark hours between this, and that long desired and much wished for time. But the same unyielding courage, and patience in suffering, which you have manifested hitherto, will bring it after a while. Too much cannot be said in praise of that noble, self-sacrificing devotion, which has been exhibited for the cause of Southern Liberty in your past history. And I am proud to say, that notwithstanding all the trials and hardships, privations and sufferings, you have been called to endure, that the same uncompromising, living patriotism burns as warmly in your bosoms to-day, as when you first left the quiet walks of civil life, and entered the army of your country. And, for which, your country will not only praise, but love you while you live, and your names after you are dead.

That there have been privations suffered by our army, which might have been avoided, we do not deny. And that the policy pursued by those in authority, in some instances, seemed unwise, we also admit. But it becomes us, as patriot soldiers, to regard these with a charitable eye. For while we have been exposed to the missiles of death from the enemy, and the diseases of the camp, we feel assured that our friends at home, and the authorities at Richmond, have been doing all the while, what they, at the time believed to be for the best. To believe otherwise, would be unkind and unjust. For it is as much to their interest as ours, that that policy be pursued, which will bring this cruel war to a speedy and honorable close. If, then, they have erred in some things, it does not become us to speak evil, or unjustly accuse them, for it is the misfortune of man to err.

It is the opinion of some, that "The danger is in such a contest as we are now waging, that we will be too favorably and generously disposed towards the Government, rather than prejudiced against it—that we will be blind to its faults, rather than eager and exacting in their exposure." We should not be blind, it is true. But that some are more eagerly exacting than is profitable, either to themselves or their country, is equally true. They are not blind, we know, when they can see so clearly as to discover a policy for the administration, and a plan of operation for the army, that would, while we were without the means of defence or aggression, have steered the Ship of State clear of breakers, and brought her into port, without a single defeat. They have never failed to charge the administration with every defeat we have suffered. They are ready whenever we meet a reverse, to show the causes, and blame the President. They make no allowances for the skill and superior numbers of the enemy—their great resources and superior arms and advantageous positions. But their conclusion is soon drawn—the authorities at Richmond, or some man with a commission from Jeff Davis in his pocket, was the cause of it. They are not only "eager," but "exacting;" and they are so eager in their exaction, that they do not wait to inquire the cause, but with their eyes open to the "faults" of the Government, they begin their unholy work of fault-finding. Oh, what a pity the President did not have his fault-finding seers in his Cabinet, so they could have prophesied before the battle was fought; whether Israel would prevail, or the Philistines succeed! But with their great wisdom, they could have always prophesied victory—and "a victory it must have been."

These wise men, tell you, soldiers, that you should not only be "eager" and exacting, but you should be "prejudiced" against the President and officers of State, whom you have called to these high positions, while you would go and fight the battles of your country. Why do they desire you to be prejudiced against them? What good can come of such "eager, exacting prejudice?" For my own part, I am unable to see any just cause for this gratuitous alarm, unless it be to attract attention to their important selves and have you claim a place in the Cabinet for them. The President is the same man he was, when he was called to the chair in Montgomery. He is the same man, and with the same views and policy, as when you, in one united voice, a year ago, said he was the man which you desired to stand at the helm through this storm which had already broken upon the South in all its whirlwind fury. And he is still heading the ship in the same direction; as when you called upon him to take an oath that he would stand in the pilot-house for the next six years. His eye is still fixed upon the Polar Star of your liberties, and notwithstanding the false alarms of the frightened or fault-finding portions of the crew, they cannot divert his attention from its glorious light on the hills of American hope. The false lights that are kindling along the shore, have never caused him to veer from the course, and I am persuaded that the false cries of rocks and breakers ahead, by these "eager, exacting, prejudiced" ones, will not be able to move his nerves, or cause him to deviate from the light of that Star which has grown much brighter and nearer, than it was last February.

We know that it is unreasonable, to expect any one to fill the high position which he occupies, and be able to please every man. No form, nor period of any government, has ever been free from such "eager, exacting, prejudiced, fault-finders" as we already discover to exist in our young Republic. No, not even the Theocracy itself was free from such men, for Korah, Dathan and Abiram, thought Moses and Aaron took too much upon themselves. And so it is now. These men think the President takes too much upon himself. "He makes the members of his Cabinet act as chief clerks, &c., &c." The great difficulty seems to be, that the President examines too minutely, all the business of the different departments. But this is what you claimed at his hand, when you required him to take the oath of the office to which you elected him, and which he has filled as well as any other man in our nation could have done. And if he fail to scrutinize the whole national machinery with constant vigilance, then he should resign the solemn trust.

To speak evil of the authorities in our Government, seems to be the pleasing employment of the class of men referred to. They have not known, or if known, they have not learned to practice the sacred law of charity, which "hideth a multitude of faults." There is a God, and that "God doeth his will in the army of Heaven, and his pleasure among the children of men." He has given us a Bible, and that Bible says, "Thou shalt not speak evil of the ruler of thy people," but they have never learned or practiced this command. And instead of practicing it themselves, they would have you prejudiced, and eagerly exacting in your demands. Oh what a shame!

When our army is successful, they say "the soldiers did it."— This is true. But did the soldiers win the victory without officers? And did the soldiers and officers in the army plan the campaign, and fight the battles without the knowledge and counsel of the President and his Cabinet? We are persuaded that the brave soldiers of our army would desire to claim no such thing. And while you are doing all you can to win our liberties, you are willing to do justice to all, from the highest to the lowest. And while you claim the honor due to your noble deeds, you are as willing to confer that honor due to both the officers of the army, and officers of State.

It seems to be the object of these men, if it be possible, to sow the seeds of discord in our country and our army, and thereby destroy the last hope of American freedom. For such would be the legitimate result of their conduct. But we are proud to know that the men whom they desire to disaffect, and persuade into the same unholy calling with themselves, have too much sense, and too much love of liberty and home at heart, to be influenced by those, who, instead of taking their muskets and helping you drive the invader from their own soil, are spending their days in ease, and their breath in slander.

We are proud to know that you cherish a sovereign contempt for such men, and for the cause in which they are engaged. For you are aware that there were men in the days of your revolutionary sires, who did the same. And you know, too, that the contempt of the world rested upon them, and upon their children, ever afterwards.

And, in conclusion, we ask you to look back over the history of our national career, for the last twelve months. We have been defeated in several engagements, it is true, but it was in a branch of the service in which we never have had but little power. We have lost our little fleet, and some of our sea-ports. But how many victories crown your arms by land? And although some would have you believe that our administration has been characterized by imbecility, and the departments with inefficiency, we ask you now, to look at the army, which is the pride of our nation, and the admiration of the world. It is well trained and well armed, and stands in proud defiance of the mustering legions of the North. Less than twenty thousand of whom, but a few days ago, defeated the whole of the enemy's Grand Army at Fredericksburg, themselves being the confessors.

We admit the force, and quote the language of one of our great statesmen, viz: "Eternal vigilance, is the price of liberty," but we would also remind you of the fact, that confidence in each other, is the sheet anchor of our safety. For united we stand, divided we fall. And while we have enemies from abroad, and pressing upon our borders, let us not forget that we have enemies as subtle, malignant and dangerous at home. But with vigilance for our cause, and confidence in each other—in our officers of the army and of the State, we shall not fail to discover every attempt they shall make, and by the help of Almighty God, we will finally conquer our peace, and drive the aliens from our homes, and the secret enemies from our altars.

And although you long for the time, and signal to stack your arms and return to your distant homes, yet we know that it is your unchangeable determination to keep the camp fires burning around the borders of your bleeding country, until you have forced the hords of Yankees from the land of wooden-nutmegs, to acknowledge your independence—or else you will fill the soldiers grave. For you, by your recent campaign, have declared that you intend to die on the field, unless you shall be allowed the enjoyments of the liberties bequeathed by your ancestors. For an honorable death is preferable to an ignominious life. And you are also aware of the fact, that "while you are determined to be free, you never can be conquered."

May the living God preserve you from the pestilence that rides upon the winds, and shield your heads in the day of battle.

APPENDIX.

In presenting a list of the killed and wounded, we have made it as correct as we possibly could. If we have made mistakes in spelling some of the names, we would be glad to have them corrected, in view of making it correct when the Journal is finally completed. And if we have not done each one justice in the Roll of the 4th, in the different engagements, we will take pleasure in making any corrections desired, provided the corrections are legally authorized by the company officers—otherwise we cannot take the liberty of altering it, as it was made by official order, and subjected to the examination of the officers who furnished it to me, as nearly correct as circumstances would enable them to make it. I am not responsible for the errors that may occur. For the tables were made out by others.

Many of you have made a bright record—one, of which you will be proud until the day of your death. And we hope we shall have the pleasure of concluding it with as much honor as it has been thus far sustained.
